REHABILITATION ADMINISTRATION OF PUERTO RICO

Mr. IGLESIAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. IGLESIAS. Mr. Speaker, I have been informed that some representatives, political or otherwise, of the island have expressed the idea and requested of functionaries of the administration in Washington that, when the machinery for the rehabilitation and relief in Puerto Rico be organized, it should be placed in the hands of a body of "responsible Puerto Ricans" who have no political affiliations and who will be free from insular governmental supervision.

I do not know how this proposal can be accomplished when a large body of men and women will be called to duty for the prosecution of the extensive program which has been announced the President contemplates to carry out for the benefit of the people of Puerto Rico. This proposal of the appointment of a "responsible body of Puerto Ricans" outside the functions of the representative government is something unexpected in the island. Anyone knows that such a group of "responsible Puerto Ricans" could belong to any political party under the camouflage of nonpartisan men, as has happened time and again.

The majority of the people down there believe and have the greatest confidence in the expressed democratic ideas of having representatives of every responsible governmental agency, as well as representatives of the economic organizations of the island, take part in such a program to assure the greatest integration and coordination of all administrative authorities in such a way that no one will have the opportunity to create any supergovernment, overtopping the authorities of the insular government. Coordination and teamwork should prevail under the organic act of the island.

From the point of view of carrying out a reconstruction program in Puerto Rico, it is particularly important to know that some experts outside the island have recommended the establishment of administrative machinery which—

> Will enlist the services of individuals and groups who, under traditional forms of representative government, have been virtually excluded from political power.

After years of advice that the Puerto Rican people should strive for honorable elections, these same intellectual persons, referring to such a program, say that leading to this end it might be possible to establish some independent body, aloof from the vicissitudes of partisan politics and dominated by nonpolitical members, to whom the task of a reconstruction program could be intrusted. How this can be done without a complete change of our democratic governmental institution, or where in the island the type of citizen just referred to can be found, nobody knows.

The following cables received from the president of the senate, Hon. Rafael Martinez Nadal, and the speaker of the house, Hon. Miguel A. Garcia Mendez, of the Puerto Rican Legislature, strongly indicate that something is wrong in Puerto Rico.

Because of the foregoing, I consider it my inescapable duty to have the above-mentioned cablegrams, which set forth some of the existing evils there, inserted in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

SAN JUAN, P. R., April 4, 1935.

Hon. SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,
Resident Commissioner, Washington, D. C.:

By resolution of the house I have just transmitted the following cable to Senator TYDINGS and to the President of the Senate: "The House of Representatives of Puerto Rico respectfully petitions you to ask congressional investigation of activities of the P. R. E. R. A. It is respectfully suggested that for this purpose the powers granted to the senatorial commission, already appointed under your chairmanship for investigation in the Virgin Islands, be extended to cover investigation of P. R. E. R. A. The emergency administration, extended to Puerto Rico by the national administration with such good wishes, is going to result in, and has already resulted in, a complete failure under the direction of Administrator James R. Bourne because of his having permitted, notwithstanding the protests and continuous complaints being received from all the municipalities of the island censuring the political partisan control exercised by the greater part of his associates, directors, and subordinates; that the truly needy affiliated with all the parties of the country be prejudiced by the discontent created among the poor classes because of the constant practice of appointing wealthy persons, in violation of the purpose of the Federal Emergency Act; by putting into effect practices showing a total lack of knowledge of the factors which constitute the structure of each Puerto Rican family, and a complete ignorance of the emotional and intellectual make-up of our people, and by continually offending the sentiments and the dignity of the representative entities of the country; ignoring the precepts of the Federal act in force in order to experiment with human suffering in order to avoid that, the public sentiment of deep protest may be badly interpreted, and in order that the people who are desirous of being able to enjoy the advantages of a true rehabilitation with the assistance of that administration may preserve their faith and their confidence therein, the house asks that you give prompt attention to this petition."

MIGUEL A. GARCIA MENDEZ,
Speaker House of Representatives.

SAN JUAN, P. R., April 4, 1935.

Hon. SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,
Resident Commissioner for Puerto Rico,
Washington, D. C.

The Senate of Puerto Rico respectfully asks that a congressional investigation be made immediately of the activities of the Puerto Rican Emergency Relief Administration. We suggest that the same delegation of the Congress already appointed to investigate the affairs of the Virgin Islands come to Puerto Rico for said purpose. James R. Bourne, administrator, Puerto Rican Relief Administration, is a person not desired by the people of Puerto Rico, because as such administrator, he has allowed the control of the relief to be exercised almost exclusively and openly by a determined political party of Puerto Rico which extends privileges to its affiliates, and said relief is not extended impartially and justly to the truly needy. Said James R. Bourne is also directing openly a campaign offensive and hostile to the Legislature of Puerto Rico. There is a public sentiment of bitter protest against the party activities of James R. Bourne.

RAFAEL MARTINEZ NADAL,
President of the Senate of Puerto Rico.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. LANHAM (at the request of Mr. JONES), for 1 day, on account of illness.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 10, 1935

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father and our God, with the deepest gratitude may we thank Thee that we are still the children of Thy providence. There are no words that can express the fullness of divine love, whose height, depth, length, and breadth can never be measured nor revealed. Lift our souls heavenward, and may we be led to enlarge, enrich, and cleanse our own little world. Hear us for our country's sake; come to our social, economic, and soul need; and save our land from ill-advised patriotism. Regard the necessities of our understanding. Deepen the spiritual life of our Nation's heart and all that goes to make up a good, happy, and prosperous people. O put the fear of God in all hearts. Abide with our homes and our loved ones, and as long as there is sorrow to be assuaged, shadows to be lifted, and aspirations to be developed, Father of Mercies, bless them. Through Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

FORMATION AND AIMS OF THE LIBERAL GROUP

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting radio addresses delivered by myself and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU] last night.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio addresses delivered last night by the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. BOILEAU, and myself:

ADDRESS OF HON. PAUL J. KVALE

Good evening. First, may I express my cordial thanks to the National Broadcasting Co. for its generous invitation to Congressman BOILEAU and myself to accept this time, so that we may acquaint you with the reasons for the formation of the group of liberal Members of the House of Representatives, and to sketch briefly what we hope to accomplish.

Mr. BOILEAU and I both affiliated with a similar group in the Seventy-second Congress in the last 2 years of the Hoover administration. Many of you will remember the constructive work that was done by that handful of 20 men, under the leadership of Major LaGuardia. The division of the House at that time was very close between the two large parties; there were Republicans and Democrats in almost equal number, giving the group an actual balance of power at times.

The House at present, however, is overwhelmingly Democratic. When that group of more than 300 Members meet in caucus, determine a policy, and carry it out, leaders can naturally feel reasonably sure of a strong majority. In such a situation, no small group of Members can expect to wield any numerical strength. We are not organizing a bloc with the idea of holding any voting strength. We are in no sense a new political party.

Ever since the opening of the session, however, I have been approached by progressive-minded Representatives from all political parties, and all of them urged a meeting to see whether it would not be possible to draw up a resolution which would outline fundamental beliefs on the major economic issues, and which would include recommendations for the essential contents of bills which must be considered before the success of the new deal can be attained. Therefore, I took the responsibility of calling the meeting, notifying only those whom I knew to be interested. No effort has been made to solicit Members other than those who made their interest known.

We met, 35 of us, and unanimously approved a resolution, which Mr. BOILEAU will discuss with you in a few minutes. In addition to the 10 Progressive and Farmer-Labor Party Members from Wisconsin and Minnesota, you accordingly see that there was a good sprinkling of liberals from both major parties, representing all sections of the United States, in the group.

They have dubbed us "mavericks", because one of our number is San Antonio's scrappy Representative, MAURY MAVERICK. Down in Texas, I understand, the name is applied to unbranded strays. To that extent it is applicable to this group, for, by adopting the resolution which Mr. BOILEAU is going to tell you about, they gave evidence that they are more interested in economic issues than they are in party politics. The resolution itself stresses the need for an unpartisan and nonpolitical forum of Members of the House, where liberal and progressive principles and issues can be discussed and methods can be devised, if possible, for incorporating them into law.

As evidence of this lack of partisan political influence, I might tell you that we propose to have no permanent chairman or definite organization, but the duties of the presiding officer will rotate, going from one to the other of the various political parties represented. Meetings will be held whenever the group feels the desire to discuss pending legislation. We meet this coming Thursday afternoon, for instance, after adjournment of the House, to discuss the administration's social-security bill.

Broadly speaking, we propose to do all we can to further the aims of the new deal for economic and social justice and to fight special privilege. Sixteen specific principles are laid down. Many more might have been added, but these are sufficient to bind the group together informally without demanding pledges as to how they will vote on any measure. Such a group will also be able to cooperate with the several independent Senators who have fought for these principles for years.

It is no secret that the majority party leadership in the House is conservative. Nor is it a secret that the House rules and procedure are such that it will be a tedious and difficult task to secure action on many of these proposals. We shall try to encourage sentiment for making those rules more liberal. And in the meantime we can resist the reactionaries within both major parties who look with disfavor on a new deal that holds out promise of security and justice to the great masses of unemployed and their dependents. We want to help the new deal keep those promises. We are interested in prompt and adequate action to that end. I think we agree to a man, we "mavericks", that without some such concerted and continuing effort the conservative elements on both sides of the aisle will be able, either by refusing to act at all or by devitalizing the measures to which the country looks for recovery and relief, to prevent the new deal from attaining its stated goal.

Those of our colleagues who are to be classified as conservatives are not bounded by party lines. They have a perfect right to their beliefs and convictions. We disagree with them, however, and shall sincerely and conscientiously try to secure consideration of the measures in which we are all interested. We are certain that if the leadership would permit various of these measures to come up, a majority would vote for them, and the statements publicly made by the President would seem to assure his approval when the measures reached his desk. But when the bills are locked in committee, or are considered under gag rules in the House, they naturally represent something completely different from what the Nation thought it had been promised.

This roughly sketches the background of the progressive activity, and now it is my genuine pleasure to turn the microphone over to Representative GERALD BOILEAU, militant Progressive Representative of Wisconsin. Since he served as chairman of a committee that drew up the resolution embodying our views, it is fitting that he be the one to tell you about its contents.

ADDRESS BY HON. GERALD J. BOILEAU

Ladies and gentlemen, Congressman KVALE, of Minnesota, has just told you why a group of liberal and progressive-minded Members of the House of Representatives have decided to unite their efforts behind a definite legislative program for the immediate consideration of Congress. This nonpartisan group is committed to a program that is progressive and far-reaching. We are neither pro- nor anti-administration. We have adopted a resolution which clearly sets forth our views on 16 broad economic principles. First of all, we take the position that the Federal Government should regulate the country's credit system, and that the power to issue money and regulate its value should be restored to Congress. We believe that the practice of issuing tax-exempt securities on the part of the various units of Government is fundamentally unsound and that such practice should be abolished. In recognition of the principle that the burden of taxation should be carried by those best able to pay, we have declared in favor of a sharp increase in income, inheritance, and gift taxes upon a graduated basis.

Recognizing the fact that there can be no genuine and permanent prosperity in the Nation until such time as a substantial purchasing power is restored to American agriculture, we are united in our demand that the farmer be guaranteed the average cost of production for farm commodities, including a reasonable profit. We believe it to be the duty of the Federal Government to enact legislation that will accomplish this objective. Realizing that the farmers are now burdened with debts that cannot be repaid without a more liberal farm-credit system, we advocate the enactment of the Frazier-Lemke farm-mortgage refinancing bill, which would refinance farm indebtedness with interest at the rate of 1½ percent per annum with 47 years in which to pay off the loan. The money for this purpose should be made available through the issuance of additional currency and not through the sale of additional tax-exempt bonds. We also favor reduced interest rates on home loans.

We favor a limitation of the hours of labor in industry to the end that the maximum number of people can be given employment at a saving wage, and demand appropriations for public works in amounts adequate to provide employment for those in need of employment at a wage sufficient to maintain a decent standard of living. We shall exert every effort to protect labor's inherent right to bargain collectively through representatives of its own choosing, such representatives to be free to act in the interests of labor without domination on the part of employers.

The present tendency to reduce local taxes by reducing expenditures for the public-school system is abhorent to those of us who believe in free, adequate educational facilities for the youth of our country. We therefore favor Federal aid to public education in the employment of teachers and the building and modernization of educational institutions.

No individual can rightly or justly claim ownership to the great natural resources of the country given to all of us by our Creator. Neither should any individual or group of individuals be permitted to own and control the railroads, public utilities, and similar industries which so vitally affect all of the people of the country. We therefore have gone on record in favor of Government ownership of all natural resources and monopolies vested with a public interest.

It is our opinion that we can best develop American prosperity and promote international peace by avoiding all foreign entanglements and by enacting such legislation as will remove all profits from war.

The social, economic, and industrial development of the Nation has been such that no one State can, acting independently, adequately provide for the social and economic security of its citizens. It is therefore incumbent upon the Federal Government to provide an adequate system of sick benefits, unemployment insurance, and old-age assistance. Such systems must be sufficiently liberal to provide a decent standard of living for those who, through no fault of their own, are unable to provide for themselves.

We are firmly convinced that the preservation of our form of government demands the enactment of a legislative program embodying these progressive principles. We cherish our constitutional right to speak our views openly and freely and pledge ourselves to protect others in the fundamental right of freedom of speech and freedom of the press.

Since this group has been organized only one Member of Congress has had the temerity to unfavorably comment upon our action. It was unfortunate that this Member of Congress happened to be the chairman of the House patronage committee. His remarks contained veiled threats against the Democratic members of this group if they continued to function with this nonpartisan liberal group. Even this gentleman did not dare to publicly criticize the principles enunciated in our program. I am very happy to state, however, that his expressions were not concurred in by any of the recognized leaders in the House, and that the threat of losing the right to name postmasters did not prevent the Democratic members of this group from continuing to cooperate with the progressives of other parties in advancing the interests of liberal and progressive legislation.

We believe our statement of principles to be fundamentally sound, and we invite the cooperation of our fellow citizens, both in and out of Congress, to the end that real relief may be afforded the masses of our people and that the blessings bestowed upon us by our ancestors may be preserved for this and future generations.

THE CURTAILMENT OF GOVERNMENTAL EXPENDITURES, WITH PARTICULAR REFERENCE TO THE TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein a radio address made by myself yesterday afternoon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address made by myself yesterday afternoon:

I am going to use the brief time allotted to me to suggest the necessity of giving some attention to our national debt, and how and when it is going to be paid.

I voted against the so-called "public works relief bill" appropriating $4,880,000,000 for the reason, among others, that I do not believe that such an inordinate amount of money should be appropriated without some coherent account of what it is to be used for. I favor and would vote for any measure appropriating money for necessary relief, but I cannot see the wisdom of a large building program which will be soon completed and leave us with the burden of maintenance. Other countries have experimented with a program of made work to relieve economic distress, recently and in times past, and have pronounced it a failure. In solving our difficulties we must not overlook the fact that borrowed money must be repaid and governments are no different than individuals who borrow. Our spending program has reached such proportions that it is time we began to think of retrenchment and a balanced Budget. We should make a survey of our situation and curtail expenditures wherever possible.

One place where money can be saved is by retrenchment of the expenditures being made in connection with the Tennessee Valley project, more familarly known to most of you as the Muscle Shoals development. Primarily, the purpose of this movement was to salvage an investment which the Government had in the Wilson Dam, started during the war and finished afterward for reasons difficult to understand. Some of us thought our first loss was our best loss, and voted against the project. In the spring of 1933, as a part of the so-called "recovery program", Congress passed an act appointing a commission of three men to be known as the "Tennessee Valley Authority", to improve the navigability and to provide for the flood control of the Tennessee River, to provide for reforestation and the proper use of marginal lands in the Tennessee Valley, to provide for the agricultural and industrial development of the said valley, to provide for national defense by the creation of a corporation for the operation of Government properties at and near Muscle Shoals in the State of Alabama. It was planned to provide a yardstick for use in determining the cost of development of electrical power which would govern the price to be paid by consumers throughout the country, and to improve the quality of fertilizers, and develop cheap methods of production for the benefit of the farmers. I state all these matters because I want to be fair in my criticisms and give you the entire picture.

The gentlemen put in charge of this undertaking were Dr. Arthur E. Morgan, former president of Antioch College; Mr. Harcourt E. Morgan, president of the University of Tennessee; and Mr. David E. Lilienthal, a lawyer who had attracted attention by conducting proceedings against public-utility and telephone companies in Wisconsin.

The first appropriation made by Congress was $50,000,000. There was allotted from the emergency relief funds $25,000,000. The act under which they were incorporated authorized an issue of bonds for $50,000,000, and the Commission is now asking that this authorization to issue bonds be increased to $100,000,000. Their budget for the next fiscal year asks for $56,785,520. They received an allotment of $1,000,000 for one of their subsidiaries to finance the purchase by individuals of electrical equipment, and for the same purpose a credit of $10,000,000 has been set up by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. For another subsidiary, to increase cooperation among the farmers, they have received an allotment of $300,000, making a total of $243,000,000, or, if we deduct certain of these items because they are not yet finally determined upon, such as the privilege of issuing $50,000,000 of bonds, the budget request for $56,785,520 for the next fiscal year, and the credit set up by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, they will have had at their disposal more than $126,000,000 since June 1933.

This amount may not seem large when we talk in billions, but if continued for a number of years it will take a very large amount of public credit to carry the load. Other items will increase this amount considerably. For instance, 25 civilian conservation camps were set up in the Valley, and the 5,000 members were placed at the disposal of the Tennessee Valley Authority. There was a substantial amount spent by the Civil Works Administration. The expense of these civilian conservation camp and Civil Works Administration workers came from appropriations other than those for the Tennessee Valley Authority activity. They also spent $824,892.11 received from the sale of electric power. Approximately 12,000 people are employed in connection with this development. The Official Register of the United States shows that 250 of them require a pay roll of upward of $1,132,000 annually, or approximately $100,000 per month. This amount is confined solely to the executive staff and their assistants, who receive salaries ranging upward of $3,000 annually, and does not include the office force or construction gangs. It is apparent, therefore, that the monthly pay roll must be enormous.

Of course, if all the activities of the Tennessee Valley Authority—and I have mentioned only a few—were to produce sufficient money to carry them on, the picture would be different; but in their budget request they show anticipated revenue from sale of electric power for the fiscal year amounting to $2,208,000. Seventy-five percent of the fiscal year has already expired and since July 1, 1934, there has been realized only about $241,000. In other words, they are at least $2,000,000 short of the estimated revenue for the fiscal year and there will be a shortage in other items. Blame for this is based on contingencies which the Tennessee Valley Authority could have foreseen. Their plans call for a large construction program of additional dams for the purpose of creating electric power for which they have yet to find a market.

These gentlemen are now before Congress asking for more authority and more money to spend on the visionary program they have embarked upon. They construe their job to be not only the items enumerated above but they have read into the act and imply many other activities, including the regimentation and rehabilitation of every individual in the Tennessee Valley, as well as others who may become residents attracted by their utopian dreams.

They have built a town called "Norris", at a cost of upward of three and one-half million dollars, with 350 houses, farm plots, parks, recreation facilities, and all modern conveniences. These homes are occupied now by the families who are on the Government pay rolls building the Cove Creek Dam, but they tell the Committee on Military Affairs that when the dam is completed there will be only 20 men required for the operation of the dam and the power houses, and will be all that will remain in the town of Norris unless industries can be developed in the neighborhood. They now have an agent going about the country in an effort, as board of trade secretaries say, to sell the town of Norris and the Tennessee Valley Authority development to industrialists. Thus does the Government enter into competition with the boards of trade of every progressive town in the country. Perhaps in the not far distant future a modern Goldsmith will be telling the story of the deserted village in the mountains of Tennessee.

They have embarked upon a program contrary to the spirit and intention of the law, the unfortunate effect of which will be to jeopardize every dollar invested in companies furnishing electric power in the Southeastern States. They have organized a corporation under the laws of the State of Delaware to encourage people to purchase electric appliances on the installment plan, one of the practices which experts say helped to bring on the depression. Their estimate is that $11,000,000 of Government funds will be used for this purpose. The Government must take the loss of all unpaid installments. In this matter they have flagrantly exceeded their authority because, had Congress intended that they should undertake such an enterprise, such authority would have been given them. Congress has the power to create corporations and designate their activities and exercise some control of expenditures, but Congress will find it difficult to control the activities of a Delaware corporation created by gentlemen who are themselves the creatures of Congress. This activity is wholly illegal and yet, if I understand their purpose correctly, they intend to further offend against the law by extending their activities throughout the country in competition with established manufacturing and financing companies.

So far as being useful in national defense the proposition is a subterfuge. It remains to be seen what benefits will result in navigation, flood control, fertilizer experiments, and other objectives. One thing is certain, they are expensive experiments for times like these. It is fair to say that all the money to which I have referred may not have been spent, but it has been made available and it will all be spent, and much more, if I understand Dr. Morgan's testimony before the Committee on Military Affairs and the attitude of himself and his associates.

My interest in this matter is because it has been repeatedly said by Directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority that the responsibility for their activities is with Congress, who intrusted them with this undertaking, and that how far they will go will depend upon the attitude of Congress. Therefore, Congressmen should know what their responsibility is, how much this project has cost, how much more it is going to cost, how much longer these large expenditures must continue, and the relation of it all to the public debt and the resulting burden of taxation on the whole American people.

The Tennessee Valley project is another proof of the error of Congress in delegating its powers. The control of policy is lost, yet the bills contracted are the obligations of the United States, which Congress must raise the money to pay, no matter how unwise the activities of other agencies may be; and the people of the country have a right to complain, and Congress must take the responsibility, if this abrogation of its prerogative and delegation of its authority result in disaster.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that business in order today, Calendar Wednesday, may be dispensed with.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry, but I shall have to object to that request. I think the committees should have their day.

COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Military Affairs may be authorized to sit during sessions of the House today, tomorrow, and the next day.

The committee is now having extended hearings on the Tennessee Valley Authority, and I am making this request by direction of the chairman and the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there has been quite a little comment in the House recently about this practice of committees sitting during sessions of the House. The practice has grown to such an extent that it may ultimately interfere with the conduct of the business of the House. Fundamentally, no committee is supposed to sit during sessions of the House, the idea being that the Members should be here on the floor. It has even been called to the attention of the Speaker that some committees are sitting afternoons for weeks, and especially one of our leading committees, without any authority whatsoever. Members on that committee have themselves complained that they were prevented from being on the floor to participate in debates in which they were interested. I have no personal interest in the matter, but the committees really ought to hold their hearings in the morning and not extend this practice so that there will be fewer Members in the House in the afternoon. The committees often conduct their afternoon hearings to accommodate outsiders who wish to testify.

Mr. THOMASON. May I say in reply to the gentleman that the Committee on Military Affairs has met almost every day for the last 2 or 3 weeks and has also met on Saturday afternoons, not only to hear important local witnesses but they have a number of witnesses who are here from a long distance, and the testimony of many of the witnesses has been very long. The committee is anxious to hasten this particular hearing as much as it can, and in asking me to come here to make the request, the chairman has announced that if any important legislation should come up on the floor of the House, the committee will promptly adjourn or recess and come here for the consideration of any important business.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I think the suggestion made by the gentleman from New York, Mr. O'CONNOR, the Chairman of the Rules Committee, is absolutely correct. This practice has grown up more during the last session than any other session of recent years; and, eventually, if we let this go on, all of the Members will be engaged in committee hearings and there will be no one on the floor of the House. I think this is a matter that the majority is entirely responsible for, and the gentleman from New York should make the objection if he wants to carry out his suggestion.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, unless consent for a committee to sit during House sessions is granted by the House, as both the gentlemen well know, a point of order made in committee at any time will stop the committee session. Any Member can stop a committee from sitting during sessions of the House simply by making a point of order, unless special permission has been granted by the House for the committee to sit.

Mr. SNELL. I understand that; but the gentleman is asking for such special permission.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMASON]?

There was no objection.

NEW YORK CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, on Friday last, April 5, 1935, I received a letter, and doubtless every Member of the House also received a copy of the same letter, headed "New York Chamber of Commerce, 65 Liberty Street, New York, N. Y." I shall just quote a few of the paragraphs contained in the letter:

> In an address in 1839, Lincoln said: "Many free countries have lost their liberty, and our's may lose her's; but, if she does, be it my proudest plume not that I was the last to desert her, but that I never deserted her."

The letter continues—

> And we will not desert our country in this hour of her wreckage and degredation.
> Countries are wrecked, not by the people but by officeholders. When officeholders want to wreck a country or do vast injustice to the citizens they select some word to mislead the people; so it was with the inquisitors. The inquisition had men sawed asunder, drawn apart on the rack, burned at the stake, gouged their eyes out, and committed other horrible deeds; and as a cloak used the name of religion.
> So it was on March 4, 1933, when the Members of Congress began wrecking our country. In order to mislead the people as to what they were doing they used the word "emergency." Of course, no emergency existed at that time. There have been but two occasions in our country when an emergency existed; one was in the days prior to 1777, when the question arose whether our country should seek to be by itself and the other was at the time of the Civil War when the question was whether our country should be divided or not.
> • • • • • • •
> There is no limit to the harm that has come to our country by the legislative interference with the affairs of the people. The Members of Congress are continually saying they are going to take people's money away from them. Throughout this country there are many thousands of cases where a man and his wife had saved money for their declining years, the man had died leaving the widow enough to live modestly and comfortably. They have taken the money away from these widows until now they are coming to want.

* * * * * * *

The Members of Congress deceive the people by making them believe that the business men make vast profits. The fact is that 95 out of every 100 men who go into business fail and the profits of the business of the country taken one year with another is barely 6 percent.

Then the Members of Congress are itching to get control of the industries and utilities of our country. One of the expressions they use to deceive the people into letting them get control of the industries and utilities is "Government ownership." Now, what the legislators call "Government ownership" means taking the industries and utilities out of the hands of men who have spent a lifetime in their upbuilding and turning them over to the control of their henchmen for the purpose of building up their political organization.

The framers of the Constitution planned to have the Members of Congress decide how the money for which they taxed the people should be spent. This was done up to March 4, 1933. Since March 4, 1933, the Members of Congress have shirked this duty, and have turned billions of dollars of the people's money over to the political accident in the White House for him to juggle with as suits his whims.

Mr. Speaker, the members of the New York Chamber of Commerce in the city of New York are some of our foremost citizens, leaders in industry, leaders in banking, leaders in welfare work, and I did not believe that this letter was published with the sanction of the officers of the New York Chamber of Commerce. So I addressed the following telegram to its President:

APRIL 5, 1935.

Mr. THOMAS I. PARKINSON,
President Equitable Life Insurance Co.,
New York City:

Received printed letter this morning with heading "New York Chamber of Commerce, 65 Liberty Street", of which you are president. Statements in it are false, scurrilous, un-American, and without foundation in fact. Please advise if you authorized its publication and distribution?

JOHN J. BOYLAN, M. C.

A few hours later I received this reply:

NEW YORK CITY, N. Y., April 5, 1935.

Hon. JOHN J. BOYLAN,
House of Representatives:

This leaflet has been sent out without the knowledge of the officers of the chamber. A proposal was recently made and placed before the executive committee that the chamber publish and distribute a series of leaflets setting forth fundamental principles of the Federal Constitution and our system of government. This proposal, however, was unanimously rejected by the executive committee. The publication and distribution of this leaflet is entirely without sanction of the chamber. The president and other officers deny any connection or responsibility for it. The use of the chamber's name is absolutely unauthorized.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK, CHARLES T. GWYNNE, Executive Vice President.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOYLAN. Now, I call the attention of the House to this letter and the telegrams on account of the high standing of the chamber of commerce, an organization that is over 100 years old in our State, and I know from acquaintanceship with its members that they would not permit or authorize a letter of this kind to be published or distributed.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. I yield.

Mr. CARPENTER. The copy I received of the letter similar to the one that the gentleman has just read did not have any name signed to it. I think it is a reprehensible act to send out a letter of that kind without a name attached to it. I have great respect for the Chamber of Commerce of New York, and I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. BOYLAN. I called attention in my telegram to the president, Mr. Parkinson, who is a splendid man and president of the Equitable Life Insurance Co., that it was not signed.

Mr. COLDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. I yield.

Mr. COLDEN. The gentleman referred to the age of the New York Chamber of Commerce. Is it not a fact that the charter was granted during colonial days, by Cadwalader Colden, who was acting Governor of the Province of New York?

Mr. BOYLAN. I think that is correct.

Mr. DUFFY of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. I yield.

Mr. DUFFY of New York. I am glad to supplement the statement of my good friend the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. BOYLAN]. When I read the statement referred to I was astounded, for I could not believe that such a responsible and patriotic organization as I know the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York to be, could sanction such an irresponsible and demagogic appeal. Then I notice that the statement was not signed and that the title at the top of the first page was not accurate, for there is no such organization as "the New York Chamber of Commerce." Further, the address, 65 Liberty Street, apparently was being used to convey the impression that the statement had the sanction and approval of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York.

Because of these circumstances, I wrote immediately to my friend, Charles T. Gwynne, its executive vice president, as follows:

The enclosed statement, dated March 30, 1935, was received in last night's mail. Although it is not signed, still the title at the top of the paper upon which the statement is printed attempts to cloak around the statement the sanction of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York. The language is so intemperate that I just cannot believe that it has the approval of your chamber.

The following day I received a reply from Mr. Gwynne's secretary, Mr. Gwynne being out of town, enclosing a denial, which has just been read by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BOYLAN]. Yesterday I received a letter from Mr. Gwynne, enclosing correspondence between Alonzo B. See, of Brooklyn, and Thomas I. Parkinson, president of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York. This correspondence indicates clearly that the 25,000 circulars were printed and mailed by Mr. See on his own responsibility.

It is just such irresponsible statements as these referred to that help to destroy confidence. Mr. See possibly would appreciate how destructive such statements are if it was a matter that concerned the relationship among the people within his own business organization.

May I ask Mr. See to turn to the Book of Leviticus and ponder on the words:

Thou shalt not be a detractor nor a whisperer among the people.

Mr. BOYLAN. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. In view of the denial on the part of the chamber of commerce that it authorized the issuance of the letter, has the gentleman made an effort to find out who is the responsible party?

Mr. BOYLAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DUFFY] has just read a letter in which he says that Mr. See, of the Brooklyn Elevator Manufacturing Co., is the responsible person.

Mr. SABATH. He is the same Mr. See who furnished so many useless elevators for the buildings here.

Mr. BOYLAN. Yes; I believe he is the same individual.

Mr. SABATH. I think it is said that he furnished about $70,000 worth of useless elevators.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the House for its indulgence. I thought this matter should be brought before you in order that our wonderful chamber of commerce in the city of New York, which has done so much good work during all the years toward the upbuilding of the city and its residents, should not be placed in a false light before the Members of this House and the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. In spite of the fact that my friend on various occasions has objected to my speaking, I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I certainly appreciate the courtesy extended to me by my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY].

I rise to call the attention of the House to the fact that I noticed in the newspapers this morning that appointment of conferees in the Senate in the future would be made by the Vice President of the United States, and that he would appoint those who are interested in trying to further bills sent here by the administration in order that they may pass. I also noticed in the newspapers this morning that the Speaker of the House had visited the White House to get orders on what kind of a rule we are going to have on the securities bill. It is really appropriate now for those in authority on the majority side of the House to get their orders from the President in the White House. I certainly appreciated the speeches that have been made by the President of the United States for social security and for things that are for the welfare of the people of the country. If we could appropriately and sensibly as well as soundly put those things into effect, I would be in favor of them because I am interested in seeing that every man, woman, and child may be happy and contented. I believe, however, that everybody should be employed and earn their happiness rather than to receive a Federal hand-out because I think everybody ought to work and at least 8 hours a day. I think if men can have all the money they want to spend and enjoy themselves to the fullest extent, that would be the kind of life many people would like, but I question the advisability of all play and no work. I was taught in my boyhood days that we had to work and that the only way we will ever have a satisfied and happy and contented people is by work.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I think many of the things advocated by the administration are dangerous, very, very dangerous to the welfare of the country. They are destroying initiative and confidence. And I tell you, my colleagues on the majority side now, that it is time for you to assume your authority and responsibility; it is time for you to decide on what kind of legislation is going to be passed in the House of Representatives, and, if you do not do it, the responsibility is on you; and that the President of the United States is going to lead you into trouble, if you do not watch out. He does not do as he promised the people he would do.

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. Yes.

Mr. RABAUT. How is it that the gentleman is giving us advice, when he has objections to our taking advice from the Chief Executive of the country?

Mr. RICH. I think you Democratic Members of Congress have at least some degree of intelligence, and I hope you will use that intelligence; but you do not display it in doing what the Chief Executive demands you to do, as is evidenced by the legislation passed since he became President.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for time to answer the gentleman from Pennsylvania, if the gentleman is through——

Mr. RICH. But I am not through. I want to call attention now to some of the promises made by the Chief Executive at Chicago, when he said:

> I am for the Democratic platform, that admirable document; the platform which you have adopted is clear; I accept it 100 percent.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield to my colleague, if he will give me more time.

Mr. COCHRAN. I will give the gentleman more time, if I can.

Mr. RICH. Then I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN. What condition does the gentleman feel the country is in at the present time?

Mr. RICH. I think the country today is in a very serious and dangerous condition and getting worse, not better. I think that we, as representatives of this country, should try in every way we possibly can to educate the people of the country to be self-supporting, to try to do those things that will help them maintain themselves, and support the Government, like our citizens before this generation, without having most everybody coming to the Federal Government asking relief. We must restore confidence in the individual.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have 5 minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DEEN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. The gentleman objected to my request the other day to insert certain remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. RICH. We should not have anything in the RECORD but proceedings of House and Senate.

Mr. COCHRAN. Oh, I hope the gentleman will not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN. Did not the gentleman from Pennsylvania last night tell me that his corporation made more money in 1934 than it had ever made in its history? [Applause.]

Mr. RICH. I tell the gentleman——

Mr. COCHRAN. I have asked the gentleman a question.

Mr. RICH. And I shall answer that question.

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman can answer that with "yes" or "no."

Mr. RICH. No; I did not make such a statement. I made a statement that we manufactured more goods last year than we have in 104 years, but we did it in spite of the N. R. A. and not with the assistance of the N. R. A. That is what I told the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the distinguished gentleman yield to me?

Mr. RICH. I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Texas, whom I like and admire for many good qualities he possesses.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman said a moment ago that he thought the country is in a very dangerous condition right now. The gentleman means while he is speaking, does he not?

Mr. RICH. I made the same statement that was made to me by my colleague when we were walking through the tunnel the other day. He said, "We are in a dangerous position." That is the statement made by my colleague and friend from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. So he thinks the same as I do. I want to assist in changing those conditions.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I want to say some things now to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

From 1789 to 1913, or in 124 years, this country expended $24,000,000,000. In 1934, 1935, and 1936 Mr. Roosevelt is asking for the expenditure of $24,000,000,000 of Federal funds. In looking at the Treasury statement issued on the first of this month, we find the Treasury is in debt $28,822,048,000.73. Add to that the $2,000,000,000 that we devalued the gold dollar last year, and which the Treasury charged off, we find that is about $31,000,000,000 now, the greatest debt we ever had. If we add the billions of dollars we are going to spend in the next 2 or 3 years, by Mr. Roosevelt, you are putting a mortgage on the children of this country that they will never be able to pay off. You will overburden them and wreck the country. You are not talking anything in the way of raising taxes today to meet this orgy of reckless, ruthless spending. You will swamp this country if you do not stop it. I tell you it is a serious situation. You ought to give every consideration to doing things in a business way.

Now, I am going to quote a statement that was made by Mr. Roosevelt at the Chicago convention, when he said:

I accept the Democratic platform 100 percent.

Just one word or two on taxes, the taxes that all of us pay toward the cost of government of all kinds.

Well, I know something of taxes. For 3 long years I have been going up and down this country preaching that government—Federal and State and local—costs too much. I shall not stop that preaching. As an immediate program of action we must abolish useless offices. We must eliminate actual functions of government—functions, in fact, that are not definitely essential to the continuance of government. We must merge, we must consolidate, subdivisions of government, and, like the private citizen, give up luxuries which we can no longer afford.

By our example at Washington itself, we shall have the opportunity of pointing the way of economy to local government, for let us remember well that out of every tax dollar in the average State in this Nation 40 cents enters the Treasury in Washington, D. C., 10 or 12 cents only go to the State capitals, and 48 cents out of every dollar are consumed by the costs of local government in counties and cities and towns.

I propose to you, my friends, and through you, that government of all kinds, big and little, be made solvent, and that the example be set by the President of the United States and his Cabinet.

Now, if there was ever a promise made to the people of the United States that is being betrayed, that is it. I want to tell you that he is not doing what he said he would do, and it is time that you Members of Congress wake up. If any private citizen made such a promise as the President made, and then do what he is now doing, what would you call it? [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for 5 minutes to reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BLAND. Reserving the right to object—I am not going to object to this 5 minutes—but we have several bills on the calendar, and I am going to object to any further requests to address the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, as a successful country banker our distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] has no equal in the United States. As an educator and trustee of various colleges he is a remarkable success. In handling the finances and conducting the affairs of his local water company, and various manufacturing plants, he has an outstanding record of accomplishment. In fraternal matters he has climbed the topmost rungs of the ladder. From his remarks here today one who did not know him well would imagine that he knew absolutely nothing whatever about legislative matters and the proper procedure to stop unwise and unsalutary amendments that could wreck needed and sound legislation.

The people of the United States have absolute confidence in their President. They know that he is honest. They know that he is sincere. They know that he deeply sympathizes with them in all of their present problems. They know that he is earnestly working to solve all of the ills that now beset them. They realize that connected with the expenditure of all large sums of public money there is always, unfortunately, waste, extravagance, and possibly graft. That is because he must have and rely upon many helpers, and all of them are not always dependable. Some of them are not always loyal to the President.

But the people all realize that the President is doing everything that it is humanely possible for one man to do in their behalf.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania criticizes the administrative leaders of the House for considering the advisability of bringing in a proper rule under which to debate and pass the security bill. The gentleman would not have any rule. He would have it wide open on the floor, to all kinds of unwise and destructive amendments, when he knows that for almost 2 solid months there have been numerous persons appearing before the Ways and Means Committee advocating the passage of the Townsend plan that would pay out to every person in the United States over 60 years of age $200 a month, that would require this Government to raise $24,000,000,000 annually to pay it, which would wreck and bankrupt this Government, so that it could not pay the aged one single dollar. He would have it wide open when he knows that there would be proposals made to take property away from some people and give it to others so that it would not be necessary for people to work any more.

He knows that last year, from every form of taxation, income taxes, inheritance taxes, gift taxes, nuisance taxes, all taxes on liquors and tobacco, the 2-cent extra postage, the 2-cent tax on bank checks—from every source, last year this Government was able to collect revenues totaling only $3,700,000,000. All of the governments on earth put together could not raise this extra $24,000,000,000 a year needed to pay old-age pensions of $200 per month to every person over 60 years of age.

Mr. RICH. I think that is just what the gentleman said it was, a crazy bill. I think the membership of this House have too much intelligence to put through a bum bill like that.

Mr. BLANTON. Yet there is now a demagogue making speeches all over my district, to meetings of the advocates of this Townsend plan, leading them to believe that it is feasible, just, and right, when he knows that it is not possible, and that he is just fooling them.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania says it is a crazy bill, yet he knows, or he ought to know, that if there were not a rule, if there were not some orderly procedure on that security bill, there would be numerous amendments offered on this floor to put in just such impossible proposals to kill the bill, which would wreck the Government financially and put it into bankruptcy if they were passed. If you want to consider unwise and impossible amendments like that, the Government would not be able to pay a 5-cent piece in old-age pensions to anyone in the United States. I am in favor of this old-age pension provided in this bill and which the Government can pay, and I wish that it could be larger.

Mr. RICH. I agree with the gentleman. That Townsend bill would be a crazy bill to enact into law.

Mr. BLANTON. I thought he would agree with me, yet he wants to open up the securities bill to every kind of unwise proposition in the world, which might kill the bill or wreck the Government.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment, if I have time, I will yield to my friend. I want to see the administrative officials of this House take steps to protect this security bill so we may pass it through the House in a proper form, in the form that our eminent and able Committee on Ways and Means, which has been studying it for 3 months, brings it in here.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. BULWINKLE. If the Membership of this House would put the Townsend bill on in Committee of the Whole, then why would they not vote down a rule which would not permit amendments?

Mr. BLANTON. Why, of course, they would. But they are not in the majority here and they will not pass any such bill.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Then what is the use fooling with a rule? [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. The House could not pass the rule if a majority of the House do not want the rule; but they will pass it if they want it. If the majority of the Members want orderly procedure that will cut out all of these unwise propositions, they will pass some rule. That is what they ought to do, in my judgment.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KELLER. The gentleman is not answering the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH]. I wanted to hear that answer.

Mr. BLANTON. I have answered him to his satisfaction. He agrees now with everything I said.

Mr. RICH. I agree with the gentleman from Texas; I think he is absolutely right on the old-age-pension bill for $200 a month, and I think he agrees with me in the foolish expenditure of Government money, which the taxpayers some day must pay. And when that day does come, there will be weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth.

THE SOCIAL-SECURITY BILL

Mr. KNUTSON asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, the social-security bill will probably come before the House for consideration within a few days. Title I, the section having to do with old-age pensions, contemplates setting up a dual contributory system whereby the Government will match the State dollar for dollar up to $15 per month for each pensioner.

After having given much study to this set-up I am firmly convinced that it would work a great injustice in a number of States that are bankrupt or nearly so. I attach herewith table no. 2, taken from the majority report on the social-security bill, which enumerates the States now having an old-age-pension system. It will be noted from this table that two of these States are in default in the payment of the pension.

In this connection I desire to call particular attention to the situation in North Dakota where a yearly pension calling for $150 was settled in the sum of $3.96 for the year 1934. No doubt there are other States in the same financial condition as North Dakota and West Virginia, and in such States the pension plan of the administration could not be made operative. Therefore, the plan is discriminatory and not workable.

I trust that the membership of this body will give this phase of the old-age-pension proposal of the administration most serious consideration before the measure is taken up for consideration by the House.

PRESENCE OF A QUORUM

Mr. HESS. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as there is very important legislation to come before the House today, I think the Members should be present. I make the point of order, therefore, that there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. RANKIN (interrupting the count). Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn, and on that I demand tellers.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Ohio will not insist upon his point of order.

Mr. RANKIN. If the gentleman from Ohio insists on his point of no quorum, I will insist upon my motion.

Mr. HESS. Mr. Speaker, I insist upon my point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. One hundred and sixty-five Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn, and on that I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. HESS and Mr. RANKIN.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 15, noes 123.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 53]

Bankhead	Darden	Jenckes, Ind.	Seger
Bell	Dempsey	Kennedy, N. Y.	Shanley
Berlin	DeRouen	Lambertson	Shannon

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and seventy-six Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

CORRECTION

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday's RECORD shows that I was paired against the McSwain bill upon final passage. That pair was correct, but had I known that certain amendments had been agreed to, I would have voted for the bill upon final passage had I been present.

INCOME-TAX PUBLICITY

Mr. DOUGHTON, from the Committee on Ways and Means, presented a conference report on the bill (H. R. 6359) to repeal certain provisions relating to publicity of certain statements of income for printing under the rule.

THE CIVILIAN CONSERVATION CORPS HAS PROVED ITS WORTH

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks upon the subject of the Civilian Conservation Corps program and to include therein certain editorial comments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, the President of the United States has indicated that the C. C. C. would have its personnel increased to approximately twice the present size and in so doing he reflected the wide-spread approval of this new-deal conservation program which has brought about worth-while results during its 2 years of existence.

The opposition press has been critical of the administration's program in most of its phases, but editorial comment indicates clearly that the continuation and enlargement of the C. C. C. meets approval from a partisan press. To quote from an editorial in the Washington Star:

The C. C. C. camps have been a godsend to hundreds of thousands of young men. They have provided a livelihood. They have developed the men physically and built up their morale. But that is not all. The wages paid the workers of the Civilian Conservation Corps have gone in great part to care for the members of the families of these men. And beyond all the benefit to the men themselves and their families, the work which has been done has been of real value to the country. The corps has been of great benefit to the men themselves. It has taken thousands of them off the streets and put them to work; given them a chance to be self-respecting citizens. It has given thousands of young men of the cities a chance to learn something about the country. When to all this is added the support which these men have been able to give their dependents, and the benefit of the conservation work to the whole country, the advantages of the C. C. C. far outweigh the cost.

Reading the headlines in the Washington Post of a few days ago we find the following:

C. C. C. is solving two of Nation's great problems; it is saving America's forests and its young men.

In the article we find:

As the C. C. C. starts on its third year of operation and talk goes around about the possibility of making it a permanent activity of the Government it is interesting to examine its results from all angles. Generally speaking, it has more than fulfilled the hopes of some of its most sanguine advocates.

In the Washington News of April 9 there is an editorial entitled "Better Men, Better Land", which is quoted, in part, as follows:

Few new-deal agencies have proved as successful as the Civilian Conservation Corps. Few are as well prepared to go forward in our recovery program. Few are as certain to become permanent in our Government structure.

With general public approval and a fresh congressional appropriation of $600,000,000, the C. C. C. starts its third year with plans to increase its enrollment immediately from an average of 340,000 to 600,000 and to expand its useful work in conserving soil, forests, and wildlife.

In 2 years more than a million young men have found jobs in the C. C. C. From their basic pay of $30 a month they have sent home an average of $25, contributing directly to the support of approximately 3,000,000 persons, most of whom otherwise would have been dependent upon doles.

The number of incendiary fires in national parks and forests has been reduced by half, millions of dollars' worth of valuable timber has been saved, great forests for the future have been insured by new plantings, killing of wild game in public preserves has practically ceased. Besides policing and reconstructing public lands, the C. C. C. has helped launch vast soil-erosion control demonstrations, and has started work designed to save the western plains country from the dust menace.

The C. C. C. is conserving human as well as natural resources. Young men, green, underfed, and untrained, are rescued from street-corner idleness and placed in camps, where they get the benefits of discipline, good food, medical care, and vocational and liberal courses of education. They are learning to use their hands and their brains and helping to rebuild the country for theirs and future generations.

As expressed in the foregoing editorial, real benefits are coming to the young men who are working in these camps, and the following article from the Washington Herald shows this to be true.

YOUTH THANKS C. C. C. FOR WORK

Leland Winchester is one youth who some day may say, "I owe it all to the Civilian Conservation Corps."

Winchester recently got a job as a result of his C. C. C. experience. He voiced his gratitude in a letter to John R. White, superintendent of Sequoia National Park. White forwarded the letter to Robert Fechner, director of Emergency Conservation Work. He wrote:

"I am now working on the San Gabriel Dam, getting $7 a day doing the same work as I did while in the C. C. C. The work is very hard and very dangerous in comparison to that I did while in camp.

"Had I not had the training I received there I would have been unable to have had this opportunity. I am writing each of my foremen who were in our camp to thank them personally for their patience and kindness toward teaching me the work and to thank the officers of the C. C. C. camp."

Winchester is a native of Hollywood, Calif.

There are few men in the present administration who are more hard working, earnest, or capable than Robert Fechner, who has successfully directed for its first 2 years the far-reaching program of the C. C. C. He and his associates are beginning now to whip plans into shape looking toward 600,000 enrollees being placed by July 1.

I have personally visited many of the C. C. C. camps in my State. I have talked to members of the supervisory staffs and to hundreds of the boys themselves. I have seen the concrete results of their labors, and I feel certain that the coming 2 years will find this program meeting with even more wide-spread approval than it did during its initial trial.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a radio address delivered by Mr. N. K. Carnes, district manager of the Central Cooperative Association, of South St. Paul, Minn., on the subject of the marketing of livestock.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, the man referred to is not a Member of the House.

Mr. RYAN. I may say to the gentleman from New York that this is a matter on which the Department of Agriculture has recently reported, and it is of great importance. It is believed that the report of the Department was incorrect, and this address gives the true situation.

Mr. TABER. That is beyond the rules. I object, Mr. Speaker.

MOTOR VEHICLE FINANCIAL RESPONSIBILITY

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill, S. 408, to promote safety on the public highways of the District of Columbia by providing for the financial responsibility of owners and operators of motor vehicles for damages caused by motor vehicles on the public highways in the District of Columbia; to prescribe penalties for the violation of the provisions of this act, and for other purposes, insist upon the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will this take any debate? Is it anything more than agreeing to a conference asked by the Senate?

Mr. PALMISANO. That is all.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. PALMISANO, PATMAN, and DIRKSEN.

COMMITTEE ON RULES

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Rules may have until midnight tonight to file a report.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman from New York what the nature of the rule under consideration is?

Mr. O'CONNOR. It relates to the social-security bill.

Mr. MONAGHAN. May I ask further what the nature of the rule is; that is, what the gentleman thinks it will be?

Mr. O'CONNOR. The Rules Committee has never considered it and is hearing the Ways and Means Committee this afternoon. Then the Rules Committee, with its accustomed deliberation, will arrive at the form of the rule.

Mr. MONAGHAN. I read in the newspapers that the committee has been conferring at length on it, and I should like to have some light on the subject.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I cannot predict what will happen.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. TRUAX. I hope the distinguished Chairman of the Rules Committee will not bring out a gag rule and attempt to force it down the throats of the Members.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, the social-security legislation is no doubt the most important legislation that we shall consider at this session of Congress.

The regular order was demanded.

Mr. MONAGHAN. I believe it should be considered under an open rule and without assurance to that effect I am constrained to object.

AMENDING SHIP MORTGAGE ACT, 1920

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 7205) to amend the Ship Mortgage Act, 1920, otherwise known as "section 30" of the Merchant Marine Act, 1920, approved June 5, 1920, to allow the benefits of said act to be enjoyed by owners of certain vessels of the United States of less than 200 gross tons.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCCORMACK). This bill is on the Union Calendar. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7205, with Mr. EDMISTON in the chair.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 30, subsection D, subdivision (a), of the act of June 5, 1920, known as the "Ship Mortgage Act, 1920", be amended by striking out the words "of 200 gross tons and upwards", and adding immediately following the words "vessel of the United States" the following: "(other than towboat, barge, scow, lighter, car float, canal boat, or tank vessel, of less than 200 gross tons)", and as so amended be reenacted so as to read as follows:

"A valid mortgage which, at the time it is made, includes the whole of any vessel of the United States (other than a towboat, barge, scow, lighter, car float, canal boat, or tank vessel, of less than 200 gross tons), shall, in addition, have, in respect to such vessel and as of the date of the compliance with all the provisions of this subdivision, the preferred status given by the provisions of subsection M, if—

"(1) The mortgage is endorsed upon the vessel's documents in accordance with the provisions of this section;

"(2) The mortgage is recorded as provided in subsection C, together with the time and date when the mortgage is so endorsed;

"(3) An affidavit is filed with the record of such mortgage to the effect that the mortgage is made in good faith and without any design to hinder, delay, or defraud any existing or future creditor of the mortgagor or any lienor of the mortgaged vessel;

"(4) The mortgage does not stipulate that the mortgagee waives the preferred status thereof; and

"(5) The mortgagee is a citizen of the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. Under the Calendar Wednesday rule the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND] is entitled to 1 hour and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH], is entitled to 1 hour.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire, not to exceed one-half hour, to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIROVICH].

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, during the last session of the Seventy-third Congress various delegations of fishermen representing the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, the Great Lakes, and the Gulf of Mexico, appeared before the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee pleading, imploring, and beseeching us to help them in this their great tragic hour of depression. These hardy farmers of the sea, who for decades and generations past have been the sturdy pioneers of our Republic, were in dire and terrible financial straits. Storms, winds, hurricanes, and blizzards had destroyed their nets, seines, tackle, and gears, as well as their fishing boats. They were the victims of penury, hunger, and want. The meager resources that their arduous labor had enabled them to save in the past had now all been eaten up. They had nothing left to hypothecate. Their credit was exhausted. They did not know where to turn for relief and assistance. Others had lost their money in banks and financial institutions. Because of the pitiful cry of their dependent children they were compelled, much against their will, to accept the munificence of our Nation through the medium of relief. These hardy fishermen who had always been self-supporting and self-respecting Americans are now the gross victims of our economic depression, unable to secure any relief from private banks or any organization or institution that might come to their aid. In addition to these contributory factors that I have just enumerated that broke their morale, the price of fish that Japan has been dumping into our country has demoralized the great fishing industry of our Nation. These unfortunate fishermen have been unable to repair their vessels, fix their nets, and reequip their boats as the conditions of the time require. To help and assist these humble citizens of our coastline to carry on their business, the House and Senate last year passed a bill enabling the Government to loan $2,000,000 to these sturdy fishermen to carry them through this frightful economic debacle. The President vetoed the bill because he thought the Reconstruction Finance Corporation had enough funds to loan these fishermen and utilize their gear, nets, and boats as adequate collateral security. Unfortunately, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation found that the Shipping Act of 1920, amended and reenacted in 1928, did not permit them to loan money on ships that were under 200 tons.

It only allowed these benefits to be enjoyed by the owners of vessels in the United States of more than 200 gross tons. To overcome this limitation I was requested by Commissioner Frederic H. Taber, one of the most lovable, gracious, and humane members of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, to introduce the bill now under discussion before the membership of this House, which would give the same rights, privileges, and prerogatives to ships under 200 tons that ships above that tonnage now enjoy. The bill now under discussion, according to the sentiments expressed to me by that distinguished representative of New England in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, Mr. Taber, will bring the desired relief to the fishermen of our country.

The only change suggested by our bill from the old Ship Mortgage Act is the deletion and elimination of "200 gross tons and upward", so that the bill will apply to any vessel of more than 5 tons, which would adequately safeguard the interests of any fisherman who is desirous of securing a loan, using his fishing boat as ample security and giving reasonable assurance that the loan will be repaid to the Government.

This bill, when considered before the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, was passed unanimously. It met with only one objector, and that was the New York Tow Boat Association. They were afraid that liens for towing that they might have against boats under 200 tons would have to be subordinated to governmental loans, which would be a great injustice to them. The old Ship Mortgage Act, which has been upon our statute books for 15 years, gave priority rights to liens for salvage, seamen's wages, stevedore bills, and tort claims. They had preferential consideration over a Government mortgage. This same principle will now apply to ships under 200 tons. However, to please the New York Tow Boat Association, we accepted an amendment of theirs which eliminated from consideration in this bill towboats, barges, scows, lighters, floats, canal boats, or tank vessels of less than 200 gross tons. This amendment satisfied everyone, and the bill has had no opposition from any other group or organization.

Mr. Chairman, if we pass this bill of mine, with this additional amendment, we will be bringing happiness into the hearts of fishing men of our country and contentment in the minds of members of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, who are ready to assist these humble and deserving citizens of our Republic. Through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation we have been lending money to railroads, life-insurance companies, banks, and business and commercial enterprises of every conceivable nature. Through the Agricultural Adjustment Administration we have come to the rescue of the farmers of our Nation who have been caressing the bosom of nature to bring forth products that are necessary to sustain human life. Through the passage of this legislation we will be heeding the pitiful cry of the farmers of the sea—sturdy, honorable men and women who have been working in the most hazardous enterprise known to mankind, the raging sea with all its ramifications. Let us heed their cry. Let us tell these fishermen, the lineal descendants of our sturdy pioneers who helped to found this Nation, that we will never forget their offspring. Let us do justice to this inarticulate group, who want no charity, who seek no relief, who desire no dole, but plead for the opportunity to have the Reconstruction Finance Corporation lend them money against their fishing boats with the reasonable assurance to our Government that as honorable men they will repay it in time. They have a right to appeal to us for this humane assistance. Justice demands that we heed their call and grant their request. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I would be remiss in my duty as a Member of this House if I failed to pay the tribute of my homage and respect to the distinguished chairman of our committee, Judge BLAND, of Virginia, and the other members of our committee, who have cooperated with me in every way to make it possible to secure adequate consideration of this measure that will enable the fishermen of our Nation to secure the same consideration in their hour of need that has been granted to every other agricultural, industrial, commercial, and financial institution in our country that sought assistance from it. [Applause.]

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIROVICH. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. As I understand, the provisions of the bill do not apply exclusively to the fishermen on either the Atlantic or Pacific coasts, but would include fishermen on the Great Lakes as well?

Mr. SIROVICH. Everywhere.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIROVICH. I yield.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Is it not particularly desirable that this legislation be passed now because of the great demand for fish on account of the condition in the drought area and the decrease in the production of meats, like pork and beef? It is anticipated that prices will go up and this will give the fishermen an opportunity to make a living in their industry.

Mr. SIROVICH. Not only make a living, but it will save money for the Government by taking them off the relief roll and giving them work. These men not only want to be self-supporting, but the only way they can retain their self-respect is by having the money to reequip themselves and buy the mechanical devices that will enable them to go out as fishermen should.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIROVICH. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. Has there been an estimate of the total amount of loans required?

Mr. SIROVICH. From the statements that have been made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and those who have appeared before us, it will not take more than $1,000,000, or $2,000,000 at the most.

Mr. Chairman, I thank the members of the Committee, and yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN].

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, I simply wish to endorse what the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIROVICH] has so well said. Under existing law vessels of the fisherman type, which average about 60 to 80 tons burden, are incapable of procuring any loan, because under the present law it is impossible to get a prior lien.

The gentleman from Washington [Mr. ZIONCHECK] has just stated that fish will play a most important part in the national diet from now on. This, in my judgment, by reason of some of the procedure of the A. A. A.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. If the gentleman will yield, I made no such statement. It is caused by the drought.

Mr. CULKIN. I did not ascribe it to my friend—I made it on my own responsibility; but what he said was true—from whatever cause, the matter of an adequate fish diet for the American people becomes of the first importance.

This is a step in that direction and will give relief to a group of men who to my mind are the hardest worked men in America at the present time. They face stress of weather in the summer and the winter, and get small returns for their efforts. This law will establish their status and enable them to make necessary loans. In my judgment it is extremely sound legislation and has the support of the members of the Committee on Merchant Marine on this side of the House.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ANDREW].

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee. The reasons for this measure have been very simply and clearly and appealingly stated by the author of the bill, Dr. SIROVICH, of New York.

I want to say, coming from a fishing town, Gloucester, Mass., that this bill, although it sounds very technical, involves a very human proposal, and means a great deal to the life and welfare of the fishing population in that community.

We have passed a great many measures during the depression for the relief of one and another group in this country, particularly those who till the soil, but no measure has been passed in the interest of these people who till the sea in winter and summer amid great hardships, with little or no reward, and heavily burdened with debts.

We have appropriated billions of dollars in the way of relief, but as yet not a dollar has gone for the relief of the fisherman. Last year, in the "loans to industry" act, special provision was made for loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the fishing industry which might be used to finance the production, storage, processing, packing, and orderly marketing of fish. But as yet not a single dollar has been loaned in aid of the fishermen. The reason is that under this loans to industry act adequate security is, as is natural, required for these loans, and the fishermen had no such security to offer. They have no inventories, such as other industries have, to give as security. The fish may or may not be caught and when caught deteriorate very rapidly. Of course, that does not offer adequate security for a loan. They have no pay roll because most of the fishing is carried on upon a share-the-profit basis. Virtually the only thing that they could offer for security was their vessels and equipment, and here they encountered a curious legal obstacle.

It appeared that for some reason which no one today recalls, when the Merchant Marine Act was passed 15 years ago, provision was made for the validating of mortgages only on vessels of 200 tons and upward. No one knows why an arbitrary discrimination was made between vessels of 200 tons and upward upon which mortgages could be placed, and vessels of lesser tonnage on which mortgages could not be placed. So the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, unable to obtain a mortgage on those small vessels, yet desiring to help the fishing industry if it could, evolved the principles of this bill which Dr. SIROVICH has introduced in the House and has spoken so eloquently for today. It proposes a very small change in the Ship Mortgage Act, providing for the validation of mortgages on vessels of less than 200 tons. If the bill is passed, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has stated that they would be able to make loans upon these smaller vessels which they have not hitherto been able to do. The owners of those vessels that sail from my town of Gloucester, which until a few years ago was the leading fishing town in the world, are in very straitened circumstances at the present time. They are unable to obtain loans from the banks and unable to obtain assistance from the Government during this period of hard times. So they have not been able to repair their ships. They have not in many cases been able to take out insurance, which is very expensive, in view of the hazards of the sea. They have not been able to buy new nets. The nets which they use in catching fish have grown smaller and smaller as they have been used, and mended, and reused with the passage of the years. There are many ships there tied up at the docks unable to go on with their business. There are literally hundreds and hundreds of families without a livelihood. It seems to me that the Membership of this House should be very glad to make this slight change in the law, which would bring assistance to these people and would help to keep alive an industry which is so appealing to our imagination, with its risks and its hardships, and which at best yields but little return to the people who follow its hazardous course. With its passage we hope that they will be able to get loans and support from the banks in the towns from which they come and go and from the great Reconstruction Finance Corporation in Washington. [Applause.]

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DELANEY] and ask unanimous consent that he be permitted to speak out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Chairman, last Monday the whole world was shocked by the news of the death of Adolph S. Ochs, the owner and editor of the New York Times. The best evidence of the high esteem in which he was held by everyone who knew him, either personally or through the New York Times, is the very many expressions of regret that have been voiced by every important personage and newspaper throughout the world.

While I did not know Mr. Ochs personally, still the columns of the New York Times have so well indicated the high standard he established that I feel we must all concede that he was a man of great sincerity, earnestness, and ability. Of course, it is beyond the power of my words to express in an adequate manner just to what extent Mr. Ochs was loved and admired by all those with whom he came in contact, but I probably could not better illustrate his slant on life than to read to you the answer he gave to Mr. Will Durant when the latter asked him his opinion of life and how it should be lived. The letter reads as follows:

DEAR MR. DURANT: * * * You ask me what meaning life has for me, what help, if any, religion gives me, what keeps me going, what are the sources of my inspiration and my energy, what is the goal or motive force of my toil, where I find my consolation and my happiness, where in the last resort my treasure lies.

To make myself clearly understood, if I were able to do so, would take more time and thought than I can give the matter now. Suffice it for me to say that I inherited good health and sound moral principles; I found pleasure in work that came to my hand and in doing it conscientiously; I found joy and satisfaction in being helpful to my parents and others, and in thus making my life worth while found happiness and consolation. My Jewish home life and religion gave me a spiritual uplift and a sense of responsibility to my subconscious better self, which I think is the God within me, the unknowable, the inexplicable. This makes me believe I am more than an animal and that this life cannot be the end of our spiritual nature.

Yours faithfully,

ADOLPH S. OCHS.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an editorial on the work he so well accomplished.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the New York Times of Apr. 9, 1935]

ADOLPH S. OCHS

The story of Adolph S. Ochs is one of a career which, in poverty and wealth, in obscurity and eminence, was all of one piece. The qualities that his employers and associates noted when he began his newspaper career as office boy and printer's devil in Knoxville, Tenn., were the qualities he manifested throughout his life. The principles he announced and put into practice when at the age of 20 he took charge of a bankrupt small-town newspaper were the principles he announced and put into practice 18 years later when he took charge of the bankrupt New York Times and carried it to influence and prosperity. He knew how to publish; he believed in publishing only one single kind of paper; and his great achievement was the proof that the publishing of that kind of paper—"clean, dignified, trustworthy, and impartial", as he phrased it in his announcement in the Times on August 18, 1896—was practically possible; was not an exercise in altruism, but could be made economically as well as ethically successful.

That he made it successful was due no doubt to native ability, to a mind which, strong in its grasp of organization, also was unusually intuitional and in flashes of inspiration covered in an instant ground that slow-thinking men might labor over for months; but also very largely to the fact that he learned the newspaper business from the ground up, was in it all his life, and never wasted his time or his ambitions on outside enterprises or on the political aspirations that have proved a curse to so many other newspaper makers (not least to his predecessor, Henry J. Raymond, founder of the New York Times). The poverty of his parents cut short his formal schooling; but, as he told the National Editorial Association in its convention of 1916, the printing office was his high school and university; and something of the impress of the old-time printing shop and of that unique and salty breed, the old-school printers, stayed with him all his life.

PRINCIPLES LEARNED AT HOME

But the principles were his before he learned how to put them into practice; he learned them at home. He was born in Cincinnati March 12, 1858, eldest of the six children of Julius and Bertha Levy Ochs. Both his parents belonged to the group of German liberals and intellectuals who had been driven from home by the repressive measures of autocratic governments against which the revolution of 1848 was an ineffectual protest. Julius Ochs, born in Furth, Bavaria, in 1826, came to the United States at the age of 18, possessor of an excellent education and fluent in six languages—German, French, English, Spanish, Italian, and Hebrew. He taught languages in various southern schools, a career only briefly interrupted by his volunteering for the Mexican War, as his regiment was never called into active service. In Natchez, in 1853, he met Miss Levy, and they were married in Nashville 2 years later. Adolph Ochs' mother, born in Rhenish, Bavaria, of a family with distinguished connections in France and Alsace, had had to leave Germany in haste in 1848 to escape arrest for her connection with revolutionary committees. She traveled by sailing ship to New Orleans, where an uncle lived. The influence of this brilliant and cultured woman on her son was immense and lasting. At the age of 70 his telegram of congratulation to Alfred E. Smith on his nomination to the Presidency took this characteristic form:

"Every good mother's son is inspired and encouraged by this well-earned climax to an extraordinary career."

Until she moved to Cincinnati after her marriage, Mrs. Ochs' American residence had been in the South; her sympathies were with the South in the Civil War that presently broke out, and her brother served in the Confederate Army. Julius Ochs, however, despite his southern connections and his residence in Kentucky and Tennessee, was a Union man; he enlisted in an Ohio regiment in 1861 and served throughout the war, rising to the rank of captain. The division in politics did not affect the harmony of the family; but when Captain Ochs died in Chattanooga in 1888, the Grand Army of the Republic was prominent at his funeral; when his wife died in New York in 1910, a similar part was played by the Daughters of the Confederacy.

FAMILY MOVES TO KNOXVILLE

After the war Captain Ochs found himself in the position of a good many demobilized soldiers; he had to start again from the beginning. With his growing family he moved to Knoxville, Tenn., a town that had been somewhat battered in the war, but seemed to have bright prospects for future growth. That expectation was justified; but Julius Ochs, scholar and idealist, lacked the talent for material success that would have enabled him to share in the town's prosperity. He served as justice of the peace and United States commissioner, and later for a short time as probate judge; his continuing enthusiasm for clean and progressive politics, in an age when such ideas had fallen out of favor, carried him as a delegate to the Liberal Republican convention which nominated Greeley in Cincinnati in 1872. Active in lodge work, he was universally popular and respected; deeply pious and a student of the religious writings of the Hebrew faith, he served his unorganized coreligionists in Knoxville as what one of his Tennessee friends later called "a first-class emergency rabbi." But his material fortunes did not prosper, and his sons grew up in the realization that as soon as possible they must begin to contribute to the family income.

Adolph, the oldest boy, went to work at the age of 11 as office boy to Capt. William Rule, editor of the Knoxville Chronicle. This Republican paper, successor of Parson Brownlow's Knoxville Whig of pre-war days, never succeeded in winning its newest employee to its politics; Adolph Ochs grew up in sympathy with the conservative Democrats of the reconstruction period. But Captain Rule became one of the determining influences of his life and inspired a loyalty and affection that were enduring. Fifty-two years later, when all Knoxville declared a holiday to celebrate the eighty-second birthday of Captain Rule—then, and until his death in his ninetieth year, still in active service as an editor—the publisher of the New York Times was a sort of secondary guest of honor; and Captain Rule recalled that "he swept my sanctum and cleaned up the papers and trash so methodically that he was promoted to delivery boy", getting up long before dawn to deposit the Chronicle on the doorsteps of subscribers for $1.50 a week.

After a year or so of this the family decided that the boy might have a better chance in a larger city, so he was sent to Providence, R. I., where his mother's two brothers had a grocery in which he worked as cash boy. But the next year he was back in Knoxville, working in a local drug store, where (tradition has it) he lost his job some 6 months later by selling a customer borax in mistake for sal soda. Early in 1872 he returned to the Chronicle, this time as "printer's devil"—the old-time printer's term for the boy who did the odd jobs and dirty work about the composing room; and this established him in the newspaper business, where he was to remain for the rest of his life.

KEEN IN QUEST OF KNOWLEDGE

In the chaotic conditions of a town recovering from the Civil War through the handicaps of reconstruction it would be hard to say whether a boy worked outside of school hours or went to school outside of working hours. Adolph Ochs had got the beginnings of his school education at Bradford's Hampden-Sidney Academy, a Knoxville day school, and during his next 3 years in the Chronicle composing room he attended classes when he could in the preparatory department of the East Tennessee University (now the University of Tennessee), where he impressed his teachers, as he impressed his employers, with his diligence and quickness. The few years he actually spent in a schoolroom might not have amounted to much, however, had it not been for what he learned outside; as an office boy, a carrier, a grocery or drug-store clerk, he was always asking questions—an acquaintance of those days described him as "a human interrogation point"; and the deficiencies of his formal education were compensated by the advantages of a cultured home and the private tuition of a scholarly father.

There remained the printing office, his high school and university, as he later described it; but the thorough grounding in the newspaper business which he got in the Knoxville Chronicle shop came to him largely by accident. When the 13-year-old boy became a printer's devil he still had no idea of making the newspaper business his life work; he went after the job because he needed the money and was hired because his services as office boy and carrier had impressed the editor of the Chronicle with his trustworthiness. Now, it happened that the printer's devil had to work at night and that his duties were finished earlier than those of the journeyman printers, who were the aristocracy of the composing room. He had to go home alone, and the way home, along unpaved poorly lighted streets, led past the graveyard of the First Presbyterian Church. A boy of 13 who had grown up in a town where there were plenty of superstitious residents, both white and colored, might be excused for sometimes forgetting the information he had no doubt received at home; that a graveyard was nothing to be afraid of. He hated to go home alone in the dark; and because the foreman of the composing room, Henry C. Collins, lived near him, little Adolph Ochs used to stay in the shop after his own day's work was over till Mr. Collins had finished and could walk home with him.

Staying in the shop, he had to occupy his time, and the natural way to do it was by learning more about the printing trade than would come the way even of an alert and observant printer's devil during his ordinary and well-filled working hours. He learned and he learned fast; and in later years the proprietor of the New York Times was not ashamed to admit that what really made a newspaper man of him was the need of company when he walked past the graveyard late at night. Half a century later, when Mr. Ochs returned to Knoxville for the Rule celebration, he and Mr. Collins went over that route again. Most of the landmarks had vanished, but the friendship that sprang up in the composing room still endured.

Those years as devil and later as apprentice were busy ones for young Adolph Ochs; learning his trade in the printing office, going to school as he found opportunity, and acting as usher, with his younger brothers, George and Milton, in Mayor Peter Staub's Opera House, where traveling companies played the Two Orphans, Monte Cristo, and Hazel Kirke, and ushers picked up a little extra money by selling candy between the acts.

STARTS OUT IN WIDER FIELD

And so it went till October 1875, when Adolph Ochs, 17 years old, decided to go out and see what he could do in a larger field. There is a tradition that he had some idea of settling, eventually, in California, but his immediate objective was Louisville; and the letters of recommendation that he took with him when he left his home town were considered more than perfunctory discharges of obligation; they were curiously prophetic. Captain Rule, the editor of the Chronicle, wrote that he had found him "honest, zealous, reliable, and trustworthy * * * quick to comprehend and faithful to execute", and "endowed with an intellect capable of reaching the highest point of mental achievement." Collins, his foreman, said that "He is to a foreman what money is to a miser—a necessity, hard to part with." His associates in the composing room presented him with a volume of Hood's poems—he kept it all his life—with an inscription on the flyleaf over all their signatures expressing the hope that "some day we shall be able to note you among the Nation's honored sons." And Mayor Staub, losing a valuable usher from his opera house, chose to speak in his civic rather than his private capacity: "For the mayor of any city such a loss as your departure, my young and worthy friend, is quite serious."

Armed with these testimonials the young printer went to Louisville and found work in the job-printing department of the Courier Journal. But 6 months later he was back in Knoxville; and as Edward H. Edwards, a printer who worked with him there, has put it, "If there ever was a turning point in the life of Adolph S. Ochs it was when, having gone out from his father's roof to seek his fortune, he so sorely felt the loss of family ties and the personal contact of those near and dear to him that he was impelled to return home." Ambition as well as homesickness was a motive, however; a new paper, the Tribune, had just been established in Knoxville, and it offered perhaps a better opportunity to a boy who was indeed trusted and admired by his old employers on the Chronicle, but might never have lived down the fact that he started at the very bottom, might never have seemed to them any more than Adolph, the office boy grown up.

ATTRACTED BY CHATTANOOGA

His year and a half on the Tribune gave him a more varied experience. He worked at first in the composing room, then as a reporter, and was presently made assistant to the business manager, Franc M. Paul—a rehearsal in each of the three departments of newspaper making which he was soon to find invaluable. For already his ambitions, and those of some of his associates on the Tribune, were looking southward to Chattanooga. The strategic importance of this city, so great in the military operations of the Civil War, had not yet been appreciated commercially; the center of a number of railroads, with rich mineral deposits lying in the mountains roundabout, Chattanooga had only some 12,000 people and was still in spirit a small town. Yet there were a few persons, including Adolph Ochs, who realized its possibilities; and this town of promise was served by only a single newspaper, the Times, an organ miserably inadequate from every point of view which was living from hand to mouth. Young Ochs and Col. J. E. MacGowan, an editorial writer on the Knoxville Tribune, were planning to establish a new paper in competition with the Chattanooga Times when they discovered that their colleague Franc Paul had anticipated them and started the Chattanooga Dispatch, to which he brought them both in the fall of 1877, Colonel MacGowan as editor and Adolph Ochs as advertising solicitor.

But the Chattanooga Times, feeble as it was, refused to fold up in the face of competition. The outcome has been succinctly described by William M. Stone, a Chattanooga printer, who was afterward for many years on Mr. Och's staff:

"In less than 6 months the Dispatch, despite Paul's planting and Adolph's watering, proved a hopeless failure. But this, unfortunate as it seemed at the time, proved a great blessing to Chattanooga, as it left Adolph so poor that he could not leave town."

Paul went back to Knoxville, Colonel MacGown stayed in Chattanooga and got another job, and Adolph Ochs was made receiver of the Dispatch, and eventually managed to liquidate its debts. But meanwhile he had to eat; and discovering that Chattanooga had no city directory, he set to work on this his first publication. He himself did all the work on it but the binding; he got the information, wrote it, set it up in type, read the proof, and printed it on a hand press. And this directory had two consequences besides the urgent and immediate one of enabling its publisher to eat—it gave him a comprehensive and thorough acquaintance with all the population and all the business of Chattanooga, and it awakened the citizens to the realization that their town had possibilities that they had overlooked, but which were plain to the eyes of an observant (and hungry) young immigrant from Knoxville.

TAKES OVER THE LOCAL TIMES

The directory not only made Ochs acquainted with Chattanooga but made Chattanooga acquainted with Ochs. The Times had been able to outlast the competition of the Dispatch; but it was about ready to give up the ghost, and its editor offered to sell it to Mr. Ochs for $800, provided he would assume the paper's debts, amounting to $1,500 more. The young man from Knoxville would have been glad to accept the offer, but for one insuperable difficulty: he did not have $800. Indeed, he had almost nothing; but he had made acquaintances and established his personal standing in Chattanooga, and after further negotiations he discovered that he could borrow $250. With that borrowed $250 he bought a half interest in the Chattanooga Times, stipulating that his half should carry with it the control of the paper; he assumed the paper's $1,500 debt in addition to the $250 he had borrowed to buy it; and with his own private fortune of $37.50 as working capital he became publisher of the Chattanooga Times on July 2, 1878.

The salutary of the new publisher announced the theme around which his whole life was to be woven. The Times intended to become "the indispensable organ of the business, commercial and productive, of Chattanooga and of the mineral and agricultural districts" surrounding the town; it would get all the news it could at home and abroad (the earlier Times had had no telegraph news at all), and would support conservative Democratic principles while reserving independence in State politics, "being cognizant of the need of and the strongly expressed desire for such a newspaper in Chattanooga as the above outline indicates the Times to be, we have taken the people at their word and shall give them a chance to support that which they have been asking for."

But, it was added, "in this matter of patronage we shall make no appeals, but rely upon that sense of propriety and justice which must teach every intelligent citizen that the obligation between himself and the paper is a mutual one, ours to print and circulate such a journal as we have described, his to see that he contributes his share, in proportion to the benefits such a paper confers on him as a citizen, the means to sustain it and promote its growth. * * * In short, we shall conduct our business on business principles, neither seeking nor giving sops and donations."

TASK A FORMIDABLE ONE

Chattanooga knew what this meant. The Chattanooga Times before Mr. Ochs' day had, in the words of Henry M. Wiltse, "dragged itself from pillar to post and had to lean heavily against the one or the other whenever it desired to cast shadow or take a long breath." It was a failing not uncommon in the small-town journalism of the seventies, a precarious trade whose practitioners, unless they were unusually able or unusually lucky, were likely to find that they could keep afloat only by giving sops to local interests, or by accepting donations of one sort or another which were rarely disinterested.

The young man who had turned his back on this sort of thing, who had announced that he would give Chattanooga what he thought it needed and would accept from it only what he thought he had earned, had nothing behind him but his abilities and his knowledge of his trade. He had been a resident of the town for less than a year; despite the mustache which he then wore to give himself an air of maturity, he could hardly conceal from his fellow-citizens that he was not yet old enough to vote. He had a newspaper plant fit for hardly anything but the junk heap, publishing a four-page paper with a circulation of 250; he owed $1,750, and his working capital amounted to just about 2 percent of his debts. Yet from that slender beginning came not only the Chattanooga Times, but the New York Times of today.

Colonel MacGowan, another immigrant from Knoxville left behind after the collapse of the Dispatch, was hired to serve as editor of the Times in such time as he could spare from his other job, at a salary of a dollar a day. There was one reporter and a business office staff of one; five men in the composing room, besides a foreman who also acted as proofreader and pressman; and the proprietor and publisher, besides being general editorial supervisor, was also business manager and advertising solicitor. The pay roll even of this modest force, even in those times, was somewhat over $100 a week, without allowing any compensation for the publisher; and the problem of meeting the pay roll in the first year was often an acute one. But it was always met, and met without any compromise with the principles announced by the new publisher in his first issue. His first year with the Chattanooga Times was perhaps the hardest, certainly the most critical, in Mr. Ochs' whole career; but the end of the year saw him on the road to success.

PROFITS PUT INTO BUSINESS

His total receipts that year were $12,000; but his expenses were only $10,000, including $900 withdrawn for his own living, and the profit was plowed back into the business. From the first he had given the Times the telegraph service of the old Western Associated Press; this was expanded as rapidly as possible, and Colonel MacGowan was soon engaged as full-time editor, a post he held until his death 25 years later. When it became apparent that the new venture was going to be successful the publisher brought his family down from Knoxville, and his brothers, George and Milton, presently took their turn as reporters on the Times, thus beginning newspaper careers that were later to bring distinction to both. Two years after he had bought the control of the Times Mr. Ochs was able to buy the other half interest in the paper that had been beyond his reach in 1878. At that time he could have bought it for $400, or probably even less; by 1880 he had to pay $5,500 for it, every cent of the increment in value being the result of his own success with the paper.

The newspaper which was thus succeeding was fulfilling its promise of impartiality and disinterestedness. To L. G. Walker, on his appointment as editor of the Chattanooga Times years later, Mr. Ochs said: "Your only policy is to have no policy—no policy; that is, except to be right." It was on that principle that the Times was conducted from the very first, in a day when newspapers, especially in the smaller cities, were far more likely to be affected by outside influence than they are at present; and it was that same principle that Mr. Ochs later put into practice in New York. But it never meant a weak policy or an absence of policy. It meant independence and a sense of civic duty. The Chattanooga paper prospered and the town prospered with it. In the language of William M. Stone, Mr. Ochs "took the dirty, poverty-stricken village by the nape of the neck and by sheer force of magnetic optimism and courageous enterprise lifted it to where it is today." One of his own contributions to the upbuilding of the city was the erection, in 1892, of the substantial building of the Chattanooga Times.

Captain Rule years before had noted that his young employee was not only honest but zealous; and it was that zeal that Chattanooga was feeling now—the zeal of a young man who had picked out a town that he thought had a future, and was resolved to make that future a pleasant reality. There was no civic improvement of those years in Chattanooga that the Times did not promote—indeed, often it started them—the opera house, the firemen's fountain, the dredging of a channel in the Tennessee River. More important, perhaps, was the Chickamauga National Park, of which Mr. Ochs was one of the originators, and which served to get him started in the park movement which was to prove one of the great interests of his life.

HIS ONLY PUBLIC OFFICE

It was, perhaps, this zeal for promotion of his home town that led him to accept the only public office he ever held in his life—membership on the Chattanooga school board in 1884 and 1885.

Mr. Och's leadership in the boosting of his home town had a number of consequences, one of which was not altogether pleasant. Chattanooga was flourishing, largely because of the vigorous work of the Times; and in 1888 the town paid the inevitable penalty of a real-estate boom. The publisher of the Times later admitted that he ran wild like everybody else and bought up a lot of land which for years afterward ate its head off in taxes; but the boom turned out to be only an anticipation of values that were really there, and ultimately Mr. Ochs lost no money by this demonstration of his faith in Chattanooga.

Another byproduct of Mr. Ochs' civic leadership had more agreeable and, as it turned out, more fruitful consequences. By common consent the publisher of the Times, young, affable, and abundantly enthusiastic, was accepted as the unofficial reception and entertainment committee for distinguished visitors to the town. He was the better able to discharge this function since he had been married in Cincinnati on February 28, 1883, to Miss Effie Miriam Wise, daughter of the Reverend Dr. Isaac M. Wise, founder of the Hebrew Union College and the Union of American Hebrew Congregations. Marriage brought him not only an invaluable helpmate but a brilliant connection. In the early days when the whole Ochs family was collaborating in getting out the Chattanooga Times, Mrs. Ochs did her part as book reviewer and dramatic critic, besides presiding over the household, at which eminent visitors to Chattanooga were entertained. To this union was born some years later a daughter, Iphigene Bertha, who was married in 1917 to Arthur Hays Sulzberger.

All sorts of people passed through Chattanooga in the later eighties and earlier nineties, and the publisher of the Times met most of them. There was President Cleveland; there were Governors, Senators, bankers, bishops, and railroad presidents. A young Republican editor from Ohio named Warren G. Harding came to town on his honeymoon, and confessed to the publisher of the Times that he wasn't satisfied with his prospects back home and had some idea of starting a Republican paper in Chattanooga. This notion was promptly dropped when Mr. Ochs pointed out to him that the only Republicans in Chattanooga were colored people, few of whom in those days could read.

CASUAL REMARK PROPHETIC

Another caller, in 1890, was Harry Alloway, a Wall Street reporter for the New York Times, who was writing a series of articles on the industrial development of the South, to whom Mr. Ochs remarked casually that he thought the Times, then in the beginnings of decay, offered the greatest opportunity in American journalism. This remark was forgotten by the young publisher; but Harry Alloway remembered it, and the rehabilitation of the New York Times was the fruit of that passing comment.

The outcome of all this entertainment of distinguished visitors, unintended but inevitable, was that the publisher of the Chattanooga Times was acquiring a national acquaintance far larger than falls to most small-city publishers, and the time was at hand when he would find it useful. In his trade, too, he was becoming widely and favorably known. Invited to address the meeting of the National Editorial Association at St. Paul in 1891, he put his finger on the great change American journalism was undergoing at the time and foretold the tendency of the future. Through the mid-nineteenth century the great papers had been essentially political and essentially personal; they were the platforms on which great editors could display their personal brilliance, and the news columns were usually as biased and argumentative as the editorial page. But Mr. Ochs told the assembled editors at St. Paul: "The day of the organ, if not past, is rapidly passing. A journal conducted as a newspaper (with the emphasis on the news) is the newspaper of the future."

Many newspapers of the South, the Chattanooga Times included, were at that time getting their telegraph news from the old Associated Press, an Illinois corporation composed chiefly of middle western newspapers, with the New York World as its principal eastern member. In opposition, the other New York papers were maintaining, at heavy cost, the old United Press. Southern papers were not altogether satisfied with the service they were getting, and in 1891 Mr. Ochs, as secretary of the Southern Press Association, called a meeting which organized the Southern Associated Press, of which he became general manager and later chairman of the executive committee. But the division of newspaper territory among three competing organizations did not prove successful. In 1894 the majority of southern papers threw in their lot with the United Press. Mr. Ochs thought that the western organization had a better prospect of surviving the struggle than the eastern; the Chattanooga Times went into the Associated Press; and the connections there formed were presently to prove of immense value to its publisher and to the greater enterprise which he was about to undertake, as well as the Associated Press itself.

HIS FIRST CALL TO NEW YORK

Early in 1896 Mr. Ochs received a telegram from a friend in New York—Leopold Wallace, a lawyer—informing him that "the opportunity of your life lies before you." To an ambitious young man of 38 who had already explored and realized on about all the opportunities that were offered in Chattanooga the information was too alluring to be overlooked; Mr. Ochs went to New York to see what it was all about.

The reality was disillusioning. This great opportunity was only the business managership of the New York Mercury, a small paper, dealing chiefly in theatrical and sporting news, which a group of politicians who favored free silver were planning to buy in order to give New York a silver newspaper in the Presidential campaign of 1896, in which it was already evident that the currency issue would play a large part. Mr. Ochs, however, was a believer in the gold standard, which the Chattanooga Times was valiantly supporting, even though the majority of southern Democrats had abandoned it. With the management of a silver paper, in New York or elsewhere, he would have nothing to do; but when the silver group presently gave up its plan to buy the Mercury the owner of that paper, anxious to get rid of it before it died on his hands, offered to sell it to Mr. Ochs direct.

This was rather more of a temptation. Mr. Ochs believed that in New York at the time there was an opening for a compact paper devoting itself strictly to the presentation of news and selling at 1 cent, a price then represented in New York only by the flamboyant "yellow" papers of the time, the World and the Journal. The paper he envisioned was very much the sort of thing that another ambitious young man, Alfred Harmsworth, was just then beginning to publish in London; and it was Mr. Ochs' notion that the Mercury could be developed into what he had in mind. But all depended on the Mercury continuing to receive, as it was then receiving, the service of the United Press; and when he found that its owner could give him no assurance of that, Mr. Ochs returned to Chattanooga.

Hardly had he reached home before he had a telegram—on his thirty-eighth birthday, as it happened—from that Harry Alloway, of the New York Times, to whom he had remarked 6 years before that the Times offered the greatest opportunity in American journalism. Since 1890 the Times had sadly declined, there was talk of an imminent reorganization, and Alloway—purely on his own account, and without any authority—wired to Mr. Ochs that if he were interested in the Times it could probably be bought cheap. In Mr. Ochs' early years in New York rumor kept insisting that he had been brought to town by various personages, from President Cleveland on down, to rehabilitate the Times; but the fact is that the only man who "brought him to town" was the Times reporter who wanted to see the paper set on its feet and believed that the Chattanooga publisher had the ability to do it.

At the moment Mr. Ochs did not take the idea very seriously; but it happened that the next day business took him to Chicago. There, at lunch, he mentioned the matter to his friend Herman Kohlsaat, publisher of the Chicago Times-Herald, who exclaimed, "Ochs, there's your opportunity." "But," Mr. Ochs protested, "I don't believe I'm a big enough man for the job." This argument failed to impress Mr. Kohlsaat. "Don't tell anybody," he advised, "and they'll never find it out."

BECOMES INTERESTED IN THE TIMES

Thus encouraged, Mr. Ochs went to New York and began to investigate the situation, which was to prove not only his opportunity, but the Times', too.

George Jones, who had joined with Henry J. Raymond in founding the New York Times in 1851 and had conducted it since Raymond's death, had died in 1891. The antiquated organism, which he knew how to operate, his children were unable to conduct successfully, and within 2 years of his death his heirs were prepared to save themselves further losses by selling the Times to anybody who would pay the price. As it turned out, only one purchaser was willing to pay the $1,000,000 they asked for nothing but the paper's name and good will—a company hastily organized by the editors of the paper, with all the money they had themselves and all they could get from their friends, to prevent an institution of great and honorable tradition from falling into unworthy hands. The company thus established, under the presidency of Charles R. Miller, editor of the Times since 1883, never had a fair chance to get started. Almost at once the panic of 1893 struck a paper which had no working capital, and the only marvel is that the organization managed to keep going for 3 years longer.

By the spring of 1896 the circulation of the Times had dwindled to 9,000 (the paper was printing 19,000 copies a day, but more than one-half of them were coming back unsold); it had outstanding obligations of $300,000, and was losing $1,000 a day. Mr. Miller, a brilliant scholar, thinker and stylist, but no business man, who would never have tried to be anything but an editor except under the pressure of necessity, had endeavored to interest other New York editors and newspaper managers in the rescue of the Times, but these men who were on the spot, who knew all the details of the situation, were of the unanimous opinion that it could not be done. A plan of reorganization—involving, of course, the raising of more money to be thrown into what began to look like a bottomless pit—was being formulated by Charles R. Flint and Spencer Trask, already heavily involved in the Times Co.; but it was generally recognized that what the plan needed was a man to work it, and every man in New York who might have been supposed to see in the Times the opportunity of his life had declared the thing was impossible.

A MOMENTOUS INTERVIEW

In this situation the young publisher from Chattanooga came to town, and through Alloway arranged an interview with the editor and president of the Times. Mr. Miller, hard driven and worried, had so little hope of finding a solution for his troubles in this encounter that he arranged for a meeting at his home and decided to squeeze it in between dinner and a trip to the theater on which he had promised to take his wife and children to forget the troubles that the Times had brought down on their heads. But it needed only a few minutes to make it clear to the editor that, as Fraser Bond puts it in his life of Miller, this small-town newspaperman had forgotten more about the business than most metropolitan executives ever knew. Theater time arrived and Mr. Miller told his family to go on, that he would join them later. But he never did join them; they came home after the play to find him still deep in discussion with Mr. Ochs; and when the two men parted after midnight, Mr. Miller was convinced that the Times had found the man.

Meeting Mr. Flint and Mr. Trask the next day, Mr. Ochs impressed them so favorably that he was invited to join their syndicate. He was compelled to decline, for their plan would have required him to invest more money than he had or would have cared to try to borrow. Mr. Flint then proposed that if the plan were carried out, Mr. Ochs should become the manager of the paper. He mentioned a salary of $50,000 a year—a staggering amount for a man from Chattanooga. But Mr. Ochs had decided that he could not rescue the Times unless he owned and controlled it. The Flint-Trask project thereupon collapsed, and another group of stockholders came forward with a proposal to consolidate the Times with the Recorder, another daily newspaper then also in difficulties and which went out of existence the same year. But Mr. Miller and his associate editor, Edward Cary, felt sure that Mr. Ochs could save the paper as an independent publication if he only had a little time. They therefore obtained the appointment of a receiver, who kept the Times going while Mr. Ochs worked out his own plan, obtained the approval of stockholders and creditors, and raised the needed funds.

TAKES OVER THE TIMES

Now at last his service as greeter and entertainer of distinguished visitors to Chattanooga bore fruit. An unknown young man from a small city, however sound his plans and heartening his enthusiasm, might have had some trouble persuading wary creditors that he could do what all the newspaper executives in New York had pronounced impossible. But, headed by a letter from President Cleveland, the Chatanooga publisher was able to produce a mass of recommendations from men whose names meant something in New York. President Cleveland's letter, in his own handwriting, said of Mr. Ochs:

"* * * In your management of the Chattanooga Times you have demonstrated such a faithful adherence to Democratic principles and have so bravely supported the ideas and policies which tend to the safety of our country as well as our party, that I should be glad to see you in a large sphere of usefulness."

With such references behind him, and with the soundness of his own ideas to prove that the testimonials were not perfunctory, Mr. Ochs managed to gain acceptance of his own plan for the reorganization of the Times, which was transferred to him on August 18, 1896.

The new plan was briefly this: The New York Times Co. was organized with 10,000 shares of capital stock and a bond issue of $500,000. Two thousand shares of stock were exchanged for the shares of the old company on a 1-for-5 basis; holders of the old company's notes received in exchange bonds of the new company, dollar for dollar, and $200,000 worth of bonds were sold at par to provide working capital. (The new publisher discovered when he took charge that the paper had about $100,000 worth of unfunded obligations, so half of that working capital was eaten up before Mr. Ochs got started.) As a needed incentive, each purchaser of a thousand-dollar bond got 15 shares of stock with it; and Mr. Ochs himself, with all the money he had and all he could borrow—most of it was borrowed—bought $75,000 worth of bonds, carrying with them 1,125 shares of stock. Of the rest of the stock, 3,876 shares, just enough to make an absolute majority, were put into escrow, to be delivered to the publisher whenever the paper had paid its way for 3 consecutive years. His control, however, was to be absolute from the first.

This, of course, was a gigantic gamble; but it was a gamble in which nobody but the purchasers of bonds for cash stood to lose anything which was not hopelessly lost already; and of these bonds the new publisher had bought nearly half. The rest were purchased mainly by capitalists who considered them a good if speculative investment, but would not have been seriously discommoded if the venture had failed. Almost the only man who stood to lose much, in other words, was Adolph S. Ochs. He had mortgaged his achievements of the past and his prospects of the future; but if he won, everybody else would win with him.

COMPETES WITH YELLOW PRESS

At the moment it seemed almost incredible that he could win; he had bought the Times with $75,000 and his abilities, but all he had bought was a great name (of late somewhat shopworn) and a deficit. Dominating New York journalism of the period were the Herald, the World, and the (morning) Journal, now the American; the former with an excellent and costly foreign service which the Times could not hope to rival for years, the latter two wildly sensational, according to the ideas of that day, with immense circulations built up at a price of 1 cent, while the other morning papers, the Times included, sold for 3 cents.

It is evident in retrospect, as it was clear to Mr. Ochs at the time, that to have imitated any of these successful competitors would have been suicidal; but he would not have done it anyway. There was only one sort of paper that he knew how to or cared to publish, the sort of paper the Chattanooga Times had been ever since he took it over, and the sort of paper the New York Times had been in the best days of Raymond and Jones. His salutatory announcement on August 19, 1896 (published in full elsewhere in this issue), promised "to conduct a high-standard newspaper, clean, dignified, and trustworthy", for "thoughtful, pure-minded people." Impartial news was promised and the opening of a forum for opinion, and the continuation of the editorial policies which the paper had previously advocated, with Mr. Miller still in the editor's chair. Despite the prosperity of the "yellows" Mr. Ochs believed that there was still a public for the sort of paper the Times had been in its best days, and he meant to seek that public out.

His influence was instantly apparent in the news columns of the Times, which in the late unhappy days had made room for items that were free publicity rather than news, and had injected some editorial bias into news reporting, which the new publisher promptly stopped. Columns of dull matter left in from mere tradition were dropped from the paper, and the policy of printing news for "thoughtful, pure-minded people" was emphasized as against the sensationalism of the World and the Journal, by the adoption on October 25, 1896, of the motto "All the News That's Fit to Print", which the Times carries to this day. This definition of the Times' purpose was Mr. Ochs' own; it has been much criticized, but the criticisms deal usually with the phraseology rather than with its practical interpretation, and the phraseology was simply an emphatic announcement that the Times was not and would not be what the nineties called a "yellow newspaper." In place of the comic supplements of the "yellows" the Times soon offered a pictorial Sunday magazine; and a few months after Mr. Ochs took charge the Saturday Review of Books, later shifted to the Sunday issue, became a permanent feature of the paper. Letters to the editor controverting the paper's editorial policy were admitted to the rejuvenated Times on a scale not previously known. The Times of 1896, smaller and simpler, as was necessitated by its constricted resources and by the less advanced newspaper technology of the period, was essentially the Times of today.

ROAD TO SUCCESS A HARD ONE

The new paper found favor; in the first year of Mr. Ochs' proprietorship the circulation more than doubled, and the deficit, which had been $1,000 a day when he took charge, averaged less than a fifth of that at the end of the year. But there was still a deficit; and after the years of prosperity in Chattanooga the publisher had been suddenly flung back to the conditions of his beginnings as a newspaper proprietor when each week's pay roll was a problem. All the other prominent papers in New York had millions behind them; Mr. Ochs had nothing, and his personal credit had been strained to what seemed at the time the uttermost in obtaining the money to buy the paper. It turned out to be capable of extensions, because there were men in New York who began to realize what he was doing with the Times, and to see that the paper was a good commercial risk. But it was years before that problem was definitely a thing of the past; and it was years before some of the men whose investments in the Times, old and new, Mr. Ochs was saving for them, began to realize how fully he deserved their trust.

Some of them knew it from the first; the faith inspired in Mr. Miller at that first interview endured, and personal friendship came to reenforce it. Another man whose confidence in and affection for the new publisher proved of immense value was Col. Marcellus Hartley, a member of the reorganization committee, who did perhaps more than anyone else to teach the young man from Tennessee his way around New York and the technique of dealing with New Yorkers.

If Mr. Ochs' way was pretty hard in the first years, it was made hard partly by his own principles. The volume of advertising in the Times did not increase as fast as the increase in circulation warranted, because the new publisher had brought to New York not only some novel ideas about the treatment of news but an unusually rigorous conscience about advertising. Certain types of objectionable advertising that were commonly carried in the papers of the nineties were excluded from the Times from the first, and a censorship system was established to investigate all offered advertising in which there was suspicion of fraud and to exclude questionable matter. In Mr. Ochs' opinion all good and honest advertising was in its way news and he regarded his paper—editorial columns, news columns, advertising columns—as all of one piece.

BIG TAMMANY OFFER REJECTED

Furthermore, he was alert from the first to reject advertising which seemed to have strings to it. A notable instance occurred in his first year in New York when the city government (then, as usual, under Tammany control) offered all its regular advertising to the Times. This amounted to $150,000 a year—a sum sufficient to insure success to Mr. Ochs' venture, at a time when it seemed highly probable that otherwise it would end in disaster. Furthermore, the Times was assured that the offer was not expected by the Tammany leaders to change the Times' customary attitude toward that organization; it was made simply because they felt that it was a good idea to support a conservative Democratic paper in New York in the general interest of the party.

Nevertheless, the offer was refused. It was Mr. Ochs' opinion that regardless of the effect such a contribution to a paper of small circulation and dubious stability might have on the staff, it would be taken by the general public as proof that the Times had been bought by Tammany, and that the paper could not afford for a moment to let that belief, however unfounded, be spread abroad. Moreover, he wished to avoid that subtle and almost unrealized influence which Tammany might wield by the mere threat of withdrawing its advertising once the paper had adjusted itself to that much-needed revenue. A similar feeling led him 4 years later to reject the proposal of the Republican National Committee to buy a million copies (at a time when the paper's circulation was little more than 80,000) of an issue containing an especially urgent editorial supporting the Republicans on the national issues of 1900.

The early years were frequently enlivened by controversies with advertisers who thought they were buying more than advertising space. To one such gentleman, who wanted certain guaranties from the management of the Times about its advertising policies, Mr. Ochs wrote:

"You must excuse me from discussing with you the policy of the New York Times. That is a subject we do not care to discuss with an advertiser. * * * We are seeking to secure the good will and confidence of intelligent, discriminating newspaper readers. The advertiser is a secondary consideration. * * * If your advertisement remains out of the New York Times until you have some assurance, other than the paper as it appears every day, as to the policy of the publisher, the Times, so long as it is under its present management, will endeavor to get along without your business."

In the course of time the advertiser in question discovered, as did others who raised similar issues, that the Times could get along without him better than he could get along without the Times, and he returned with the understanding that what he bought was space in the paper and no more. These advertising policies, like the policy in treating news which Mr. Ochs announced in 1896 and followed ever afterward, are now the commonplace practice of all respectable newspapers. But in the nineties they were not commonplace, and newspapers then and now counted respectable did not always adhere to them—until Mr. Ochs had demonstrated that it was possible to publish a paper of those principles, and make it pay.

TWO ALARMING SET-BACKS

Despite what many practical newspapermen of the nineties must have regarded as the handicaps of honesty and dignity, the Times was steadily, though slowly, going ahead in circulation and advertising. But in Mr. Ochs' first 2 years came two external calamities, each of which in turn all but ruined the new venture before it was fairly started. In 1897 the old United Press, which most of the New York papers had been supporting at heavy cost, collapsed. Mr. Ochs, whose Chattanooga Times was a member of the Western Associated Press, immediately applied for membership in that organization for the New York Times, as did the other New York papers. The World had previously been the only member of the Associated Press in New York, and Joseph Pulitzer had the power of veto over new applicants in the city. He readily agreed to admit the Sun, the Herald, and the Tribune; but at first he would not have the Associated Press service extended to the Times. The paper was dying, he said, and there was no use in prolonging the agony. Refusal of Associated Press service at a period when the Times could afford very little special correspondence would have ruined the paper; but eventually Mr. Pulitzer was persuaded to let it come into the Associated Press with a class B nonvoting membership, which, though it carried a derogatory implication with it, did give the Times the Associated Press news.

A few years later the Associated Press had to be reorganized under a New York charter; and Mr. Ochs, whose paper could no longer be stigmatized as "moribund", became a full member, a director, and member of the executive committee. He held these offices for the rest of his life, and was one of the three or four men who practically made the Associated Press of today.

The second and more disastrous external event was the War with Spain. It was largely made by the newspapers, and was perhaps the greatest opportunity for newspaper showmanship that has ever been offered. The immense expenditures for staff writers, staff artists, special dispatch boats, and cable tolls in which the other New York papers competed were beyond the capacity of the Times; it had to be content with the Associated Press news, supplemented by a little mail correspondence, and consequently could not hope to share in the fantastic rise in circulation which partially compensated some of its more prosperous rivals for the money they poured out. But inevitably the Times lost advertising when the other papers did; and a loss that the Hearst, Pulitzer, Reid, and Bennett fortunes could bear threatened to be fatal to the publisher of the Times, who had used up his meager working capital and had absolutely nothing else.

The deficit in Mr. Ochs' second year was $78,000—larger than in the first year; the circulation had been pushed up to 25,000, but the advertising linage of 1898 showed only a 10-percent gain over 1896. Something had to be done. Mr. Ochs was advised to raise the price of the paper from 3 cents to 5 cents a copy, on the theory that people who wanted his kind of paper would as soon pay 5 cents for it as 3. To the astonishment of everyone, Mr. Ochs proposed instead to cut the price to 1 cent.

FAITH IN PUBLIC VINDICATED

This was to prove one of the most brilliant of his inspirations; but it had behind it the solid faith of a lifetime—the faith that there was a public for the only kind of paper Mr. Ochs could or would publish, and a larger public than the Times then enjoyed. Mr. Ochs believed that there were many people in the city who bought the yellow journals only because they cost a third as much as the other papers and that they would buy a different sort of paper if they could get it for the same price. He was well aware that the 1-cent price was regarded as the badge of the yellow press and that some people would suppose, when the Times went to that price, that it was going to that manner, too; he knew that there would be—as, indeed, at first there were—suspicions that some outside interest had subsidized the paper. His only defense against these suspicions would have to be the paper as it appeared every day; and he had faith that people who could now get for 1 cent the same kind of paper that they had formerly paid 3 cents for would realize that the suspicions were baseless.

They did. Despite the universal belief among New York newspapermen (outside the Times) that the cut in price was the beginning of the end, it was, in fact, the beginning of victory. The circulation of the paper instantly began to leap; the public for that kind of paper at a lower price, which Mr. Ochs alone had discerned, was actually there. A year after the change the circulation of the Times had trebled, rising from 25,000 to 76,000, and, except for a brief recession after the World War, it has been rising ever since, even though in 1918, when all newspapers had to face increased production costs, the price per copy was raised to 2 cents. Mr. Ochs' third year as publisher showed a profit of $50,000, and from then on the success of the Times was assured. So obvious was this that the reorganization committee of 1896, which was to continue until the paper was firmly on its feet, was dissolved at the end of the second year. The original agreement had stipulated that the 3,876 shares held in escrow should be turned over to Mr. Ochs when he had made the paper pay for 3 successive years. On July 1, 1900, he had fulfilled this condition and became the owner of a majority stock interest in the Times, which he retained ever afterward, with some increase.

GROWTH FINANCED WITH PROFITS

The great fight of Mr. Ochs' life was won, therefore, by 1900, and he won it by himself. Other men, before and afterward, made great contributions to the paper, the value of which he was always the first to acknowledge. But he was the man who (as A. E. Bradford, a veteran of the editorial room, put it) "found the paper on the rocks and turned them into foundation stones." Another editorial veteran, F. J. Mortimer, amplified this a little:

"The rest of the paper, plant and men, was just the same the day before he took command and the day afterward. He was the only difference; and from the moment he came in a paper that had been steadily going down turned right around and started going up."

That it kept on going up was due very largely, in Mr. Och's opinion, to the fact that most of the profits were plowed back into the business—plowed back, needless to say, in a wise and productive fashion. The Times paid its way out of its own earnings. On Mr. Ochs' twenty-first anniversary, August 18, 1921, he announced that the gross income of the paper for that quarter century had been about $100,000,000, of which only $3,750,000—an average of $125,000 a year—had been withdrawn as dividends. The rest of the profits had gone into financing the growth of the paper.

The story of Adolph S. Ochs during those years was the story of the New York Times. The two are inseparably woven. He had already laid down his fundamental code of integrity, soundness and completeness, and from this he never varied. But new inventions, new ideas and the broadening horizon of world events made necessary a constantly widening interpretation of "All the news that's fit to print." As the Times grew, Mr. Ochs grew with it, seizing upon every improvement in technique that would enable his paper to get the news more quickly and more fully and to print it and get it to the reader in the best possible form and with the least possible lapse of time. The development of the Times carried the double threads of constantly improved newspaper making and of world-shaking events which put an unprecedented strain upon every facility a newspaper had.

An account of the mechanical improvements in the production of the Times since Mr. Ochs took over the paper would be a long story in itself. In 1896 the Times was still being published on Park Row, in a building which, at its completion 8 years earlier, had been regarded as the last word in newspaper housing. With the paper's growing prosperity this building became too small. Realizing the northward drift of business and population, Mr. Ochs resolved to build in what is now known as Times Square, then a decidedly second-rate neighborhood. The design chosen for this structure, which is still one of New York's landmarks, was derived from the celebrated Giotto Campanile at Florence, and it was regarded as one of the architectural triumphs of its decade. Pressrooms and editorial rooms were newly equipped and enlarged, and in January 1905 the paper was moved uptown without missing an edition.

NEW QUARTERS SOON OUTGROWN

Perhaps nothing so dramatically indicates the growth of the Times during this period as does the fact that this spacious building, planned with all the foresight that proprietor, architect, and staff possessed, became too small in exactly 7 years. The Times grew out of its quarters, then and afterward, somewhat as a healthy boy grows out of his clothes. From the Times Building, which still bears that name, the paper migrated, in 1913, to the Times Annex, at 229 West Forty-third Street, just off the square. In 1924 and again in 1931, additions had to be made to the Annex. In each case Mr. Ochs took pride in erecting a dignified, appropriate, and beautiful building.

Meanwhile the development of rotogravure made necessary a separate plant for that process, constructed at 636 West Forty-fourth Street, in 1925. A new building was erected in Brooklyn in 1931 to print the paper's Brooklyn and Queens edition. The processes of setting type, of stereotying, and of printing were continually being improved, and the Times, under Mr. Ochs' direction, never lagged in taking advantage of each new improvement. Mr. Ochs, who had set type by hand and had done some of his first printing on a hand-operated press, took a personal interest in each forward step in the mechanical department. In becoming a newspaper proprietor he took pride in not ceasing to be a printer, and a good one.

In 1926 he found it necessary to become, by proxy, a papermaker as well as a printer. In that year the Times became a large stockholder in the Spruce Falls Power & Paper Co., with holdings of approximately 5,000 square miles of timber rights in northern Ontario, and subsequently one of the greatest paper-making plants in the world was erected by the company at Kapuskasing, Ontario. From this mighty plant comes now all of the newsprint used by the Times.

The mechanics of communication were always important in Mr. Ochs' eyes. He was early interested in Marconi's experiments with the wireless, and arranged with Marconi, in cooperation with the London Times, for the first regular trans-Atlantic wireless news service in 1907. For a time most of the Time's European news was transmitted in this fashion. Mr. Ochs was also a pioneer enthusiast for aviation, encouraged some of the first cross-country flights, and made use of airplanes for carrying photographs and delivering papers.

He saw, too, that improved means of communication and higher-speed presses would be of little value without a well-organized world-wide news service, and this he set out to get, just as he had earlier done on a smaller scale in Chattanooga. In 1901 he arranged with the London Times for an exchange of services which gave him the dispatches of that paper from all parts of the earth. It was this cooperation that gave the Times the first wireless account of a naval battle—that sent by Capt. Lionel James from a dispatch boat 150 miles at sea during the encounter between the Russian and Japanese fleets in 1904. Mr. Ochs had a keen interest in exploration, both for its own sake and for its value as news, and showed it in practically every expedition of importance from Peary's journey to the North Pole to Admiral Byrd's flight over the South Pole, and afterward. He realized, too, the value of scientific news of all kinds, and the Times gave much space to it, especially after the World War. But complete presentation of all news worth printing, whether routine or otherwise, continued to be his ideal.

The World War was a severe test not only of a paper's ability to get and print the news, but of its editorial soundness and of the impartiality of its news columns. Editorially the Times decided that the German Government was in the wrong. In the news columns and in the Sunday editions it aimed to present not only all the actual events of the war without bias, but also to give every point of view a chance for expression. Mr. Ochs took it as a tribute to the success of this latter policy that the Times was accused by German sympathizers of favoring the Allies and by allied sympathizers of favoring Germany. The Times organized its European news service so thoroughly that it sometimes published more special foreign dispatches than all other American newspapers combined. Of particular value to students of the war was its practice of printing all important documents in full, no matter what their length.

At the end of the war Mr. Ochs had the satisfaction of knowing that his newspaper had reached a peak of prestige and prosperity which in the earlier years he had hardly dared dream of. In June 1918 the Times had received the first award of the Pulitzer Gold Medal for "disinterested and meritorious service" for publishing in full so many official reports, documents, and speeches by European statesmen relating to the progress and conduct of the war. Advertising, circulation, and the size of the paper had expanded greatly, though the records of 1918 were to be far surpassed in later years. Mr. Ochs was not the man to take this success as a purely personal triumph, and he was generous in his appreciation of the men who had worked with him to bring it about. His material success probably meant less to him than the demonstration that his ideals of journalism and his faith in the fundamental decency of human nature were sound.

IN FIGHT FOR WORLD PEACE

The post-war period did nothing to shake either his ideals or his faith, though it culminated in the depression of 1929. Editorially the Times threw itself into the fight to bring about world peace through the League of Nations just as it had fought for the same end in a different way during the war. The post-war news was just as important and almost as exciting as that of the war itself, and the Times expanded its news-gathering network in Europe and all over the world. It continued to print important documents in full, beginning with the full text of the Versailles Treaty, which was the first paper in the world to publish it completely. It retained its interest in science and exploration.

It adhered to its old policy of presenting the news without bias. Its success in this field was illustrated in 1932, when Walter Duranty, the Times correspondent in Moscow, received the Pulitzer prize. Editorially the Times had as little sympathy as a newspaper could have with the ideas and policies of the Soviet government, yet it was able, through Mr. Duranty, to give the news of the Communist experiment so impartially that it gained the confidence of readers of all shades of opinion. In May 1930 the Times received the first award of the medal of the University of Missouri School of Journalism "for distinguished service in journalism."

The success of the Times might have suggested to another man than Mr. Ochs the possibility of a chain of newspapers based on the same idea, which, as it always seemed to him, would work not only in Chattanooga and New York but in any other American city. In 1899 Mr. Ochs did contemplate buying the New York Telegram, then owned by James Gordon Bennett. Later, in 1901 and 1902, he bought the Philadelphia Times and Ledger and amalgamated them, his brother, the late George W. Ochs Oakes (who took the added name of Oakes in 1917), becoming editor. In 1913 Mr. Ochs sold the Ledger to Cyrus H. K. Curtis. In 1918 he had almost completed arrangements to buy the Herald and the Telegram when the death of Mr. Bennett put an end to the negotiations. In the end Mr. Ochs came to regard the management of the New York Times, with its growing circulation, not only in New York but throughout the world, as a big enough job for any man. As related but independent enterprises, however, he established the Annalist, a weekly financial review; Current History, a monthly survey of world affairs, long edited by George W. Ochs Oakes, and the Midweek Pictorial, an illustrated review of the week's news. As component parts of the Times he developed the weekly Book Review, the Times Magazine, and the Sunday feature section.

STEADY RISE IN CIRCULATION

The steady growth of the paper is reflected in the circulation statistics over a period of years. The figures by 2-year periods from 1896 to 1934 are as follows:

Mr. Ochs often spoke of this circulation growth as "a vindication of the newspaper reader", in that it proved that there was a public interested in a clean, dignified newspaper. There was nothing perfunctory in his relation to anything that the Times did. He was interested in every activity as an exemplification of the ideal that he, as a publisher, was trying to carry out. He took a similar interest in the business policies of the paper, a field in which he was just as much at home as in the news and editorial departments. In his eyes the Times was a unified enterprise, with operating distinctions between the different departments, but with no difference as to fundamental principles among them. Truth in advertising was as important to him as truth in the news columns and integrity in the editorial columns, as he proved again and again, at whatever sacrifice of revenue. The Times' censorship of advertising set a standard for American journalism. In the field of circulation, Mr. Ochs never had any sympathy with artificial devices to bring in new readers. He relied on the paper itself to be its own circulation getter, and the circulation department did its work without any offer of premiums or other special inducements.

Mr. Ochs made much of his conception of the New York Times as the accepted newspaper of record. It was the obligation of a newspaper, he thought, to present a complete record of its time. An important and logical part of this conception was the inauguration, in 1913, of the New York Times Index, listing and cross-referencing every news item in the Times' columns. In 1927, to make the record in its files imperishable, the Times began printing each day a limited edition upon pure rag-paper stock for indefinite preservation in bound files.

The personality of Mr. Ochs dominated his newspaper. Probably few other journals have ever reflected the personality of their publishers more definitely and completely than the Times has Mr. Ochs'—but in a different way from that generally associated with such a reflection. He placed an imprint of character upon the organization. He did not permit the Times to exploit himself, his personal interests, antipathies or likes, or to swerve in the slightest degree because of his own opinions from the balance of impartial news presentation. His name rarely appeared in its columns.

Mr. Ochs believed that a single authority should control and direct a newspaper. He thought that committee management was fatal, ineffective. But though he was supreme, he welcomed the frank expression of opinions contrary to his own. He once said that one of the most valuable men on his staff was one who rarely agreed with him. Mr. Ochs always could count upon this man for a strong, reasoned statement of the other point of view.

PIONEER IN MANY WAYS

Mr. Ochs' eager, active mind, devoting itself constantly to the Times, was generally so far in advance of others that some of his associates felt their task was to serve as a brake upon his audacity.

Generally, he was looked upon as a conservative. Yet it was he who pioneered in many fields of newspaper building. He was the first to bring rotogravure printing for newspaper picture sections to the United States. He looked upon this beautiful process of printing as the best means of presenting news in pictures to readers. The Times rotogravure section has not shown oddities and notorious persons, but has accepted its task as gathering the important news of the world in pictures. The Times' own Wide World Photo Service, with bureaus and correspondents all over the world, for the purpose of assembling the best news pictures, was Mr. Ochs' idea of what such a department of a newspaper should be.

Again, Mr. Ochs was a pioneer in the improvement of newspaper printing. He developed the idea of the Times' typographical standards, which forbids display advertisements to use unlimited areas of crude blacks in type or illustration of bizarre arrangements of type—a forward step now adopted by more than a score of other important newspapers.

Mr. Ochs had a habit of making friendly and unostentatious tours of the building, often with some distinguished visitor. His use of power had nothing of arbitrariness; rather was it exerted as an influence. The editorial page, for instance, commanded his keenest interest, and when at the office he was accustomed to interrupt his executive duties at noon each day to preside over the editorial conference which argued out and decided on the editorials for the following issue. In consonance with his general theory of newspaper policy he believed that an editorial page should be temperate in statement and should recognize that there is usually something to be said on both sides of a question. Coming up from Chattanooga he had described himself as a conservative Democrat, a term which had some meaning in Grover Cleveland's day. Mr. Ochs had a whole-hearted admiration for Woodrow Wilson, as he had had for Cleveland. But his Democratic principles did not prevent him giving support to the President of whatever political faith so long as the administration policies warranted it.

CONSISTENTLY BROAD-MINDED

In this and other matters of policy the editorial page was a reflection of Mr. Ochs' personality. Naturally, he did not bring to the Times editorial writers who were not in sympathy with its general principles; he did not believe that it would be fair to the writers or to the Times to do so. Yet the Times editorial staff under Mr. Ochs' direction had room not only for the full freedom of the individual writer's conscience but for a considerable variety of temperament and opinion. On points not involving his fundamental principles Mr. Ochs was always ready to listen to argument; in fact, he enjoyed the clash of opinions. On certain issues which he felt keenly he did not yield, but even then no man ever had to write against his own convictions. The power of Adolph S. Ochs was not that of the money which had come to him but of his personality and his ideas. To the Times he was more than a proprietor; he was what he had been to Foreman Collins, of the Knoxville Chronicle—"a necessity, hard to part with."

The least pretentious of men, he refused to make a mystery of his own success. The principles he had followed seemed to him self-evident, and he believed that they would have the same results if they were followed anywhere else. To a newspaper man who observed in later years that Mr. Ochs had come to New York and taught New York journalists something new he remarked that he had only reminded them of something they had forgotten. Speaking at the convention of the National Editorial Association in 1916, he said that he had practiced no new journalism in New York—only the old journalism, the kind that succeeded best in small towns. The policy of having no policy except to be as right as you know how—this had been his sole admonition to a new editor of his Chattanooga paper—was what he had followed in Chattanooga and in New York as well. It means that clear, honest thinking, not expediency or partisanship, dictated the editorial decisions.

He seemed hardly aware that high principles, though they make success a public good instead of a public evil, do not guarantee success; and that his own achievement was due not only to the ideas and ideals which he cherished but to his boundless energy, his supreme confidence, his willingness to stake everything on what he believed to be right and sound, and the confidence he inspired in other men. He had the qualities of a born leader. He had the rare ability, as he showed in 1896, to win victories with a defeated and discouraged army.

PAPER'S LEADER TO THE END

Mr. Ochs continued to direct the Times all his life, keeping in close touch by telephone or cable whenever he was away from the office. As one of his subordinates testified before a Senate committee which once had some suspicions of absentee influence on the Times, he was, when in town, "there every day." His town house was for many years at 308 West Seventy-fifth Street until in the fall of 1931 he bought an estate in White Plains. During the war Mr. Ochs purchased the country seat of George Foster Peabody, Abenia, on Lake George, and there used to spend his summers in a colony where he had many friendships and where he could enjoy a daily game of not very laborious or too serious golf; but even during the summer absences at the lake he was in communication with the Times by telephone morning, afternoon, and evening. In his later years he traveled in Europe more frequently than he had done before the war, became acquainted with virtually all the leaders of politics and public opinion, and devoted himself with all his private energies as well as those of his paper to the endeavor to smooth out misunderstandings and promote a better relation between Europe and the United States.

The publishing of the Times was his avocation and his hobby as well as his vocation. He put into it the best that he had to give to his fellow men, with a high seriousness and an unremitting sense of responsibility. He was a religious man in his daily work as well as outside of it, and many of his statements bore testimony thereto. Not only by tradition but by conviction he was a firm adherent of the reformed Jewish faith. He said at the Cleveland convention of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations in January 1927:

"What we as a religious people have preserved through centuries of oppression is rapidly becoming the accepted concept of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. It is called modernism, but it harks back to the underlying faith of an ancient people, who gave to civilization the Ten Commandments, the prophets, and the Psalms."

It was in keeping with his conception of his faith and of his people's place in history that he was opposed to Zionism. In a statement in the American Israelite in 1922 he said that "the greatest heritage of the Jew is his religion. * * * As a distinctive race the Jews need no place in modern civilization." Nevertheless, he was open-minded enough to be immensely impressed during his travels in Palestine by the achievements and the spirit of the Zionist pioneers, however much he questioned the ultimate validity of their objective.

ACTIVE IN WELL-BEING

For many years he was a trustee of Temple Emanu-El in New York, and in 1924 he gave to the congregation in Chattanooga a new building which was named, in honor of his parents, the Julius and Bertha Ochs Memorial Temple. In 1926 he undertook the chairmanship of the committee which succeeded in raising more than $4,000,000 for the Hebrew Union College, which his father-in-law had founded.

One of the principal interests of his later years was the park movement, in which he had been active long before as one of the advocates of the proposal for the Chickamauga National Park, near Chattanooga. It was due chiefly to him that the Lookout Mountain National Park was later instituted to preserve this historic battlefield nearer the city; he was active also in the organization which preserved the battlefield of Saratoga. The Times' consistent endeavors to protect New York City parks against encroachment is, of course, well known. In recognition of this stand the Park Association of New York City awarded its medal to Mr. Ochs in 1931.

Of his contributions to public causes, perhaps the most notable was the gift of $500,000 which he caused the New York Times to make to finance the preparation of the manuscript of the Dictionary of American Biography, whose successive volumes have met a need of American scholarship which had long been felt. The New York Times also began in 1928 the preparation and publication of the American Yearbook.

Of the numerous foreign decorations which he might have had Mr. Ochs accepted only one—membership in the French Legion of Honor, in which he was later promoted to be commander. He made an exception of the Legion because it was so universally looked upon as being free from political significance. To the acceptance of academic honors, fittingly bestowed on a publisher who had done his best to make his paper an educational institution, he was more hospitable. He was made an honorary master of arts by Yale in 1922, and in subsequent years received honorary doctorates from Columbia University, the University of Chattanooga, New York University, Dartmouth, and Lincoln University. In 1927 he received the gold medal of the National Institute of Social Sciences; in 1929 he was one of seven citizens of New York cited for distinguished service by the chamber of commerce; and in 1931 he became a member of the American Philosophical Society.

No honor gratified him more, however, than the title of Citizen Emeritus of Chattanooga, which was formally conferred on him in July 1928, at the conclusion of a 3-day celebration of his semicentennial as proprietor of the Chattanooga Times. This celebration was organized by the city and county governments and attended by deputations from the Associated Press, the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, the newspaper publishers, and the Advertising Club of New York City and the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York. He always retained an affection for Chattanooga and an interest in its affairs, and the friendships which he had made there as a struggling young man were broken only by death.

WELFARE OF THE STAFF

Of the welfare of the army of employees required to get out the Times, Mr. Ochs was always solicitous. On March 12, 1918, he celebrated his sixtieth birthday by the establishment of group insurance for all employees, increasing the maximum amount on later anniversaries. His quarter-centennial as publisher of the Times was marked by the institution of a system of sick benefits and a retirement pension fund. For Mr. Ochs' unusual thoughtfulness and generosity in individual instances hundreds of the Times staff in both important and humble positions had cause to be grateful. An incident illustrates his unvarying thoughtfulness. Junior employees of the Times receiving less than $18 weekly have a lunch card which permits them to purchase a complete 50-cent lunch for 10 cents. When the Times annex was enlarged in 1931 it was necessary to close the restaurant for 2 weeks, and due notice was given. Upon the reopening of the restaurant every employee having a lunch card was surprised to receive, at Mr. Ochs' orders, a check to cover the extra cost of their lunches for the period of closing.

THE HUNDRED NEEDIEST CASES

A charity which came close to Mr. Ochs' heart and engaged his warm personal interest was the collection of funds, each year at the Christmas season, for "the hundred neediest cases." This feature was inaugurated by him in 1912, when a fund of $3,630 was collected to be distributed to persons in direct need chosen from lists furnished by the leading charitable organizations of the city. The appeal was and still is made solely through the publication of brief individual narratives in the Times. In this way Mr. Ochs tried to bring home to his readers the poignant facts of destitution and to enlist their cooperation in relieving it. There was no personal solicitation; the contributions were wholly spontaneous, sometimes coming from readers who did not even give their names; and every cent collected went to relieve want, the expense of administration being met by the charitable organizations sending in the lists of cases and the other expenses by the Times. No feature of the paper had more importance in Mr. Ochs' eyes during the Christmas season than this. He followed the campaign closely, even in its details, and rejoiced as the totals mounted.

The number of cases relieved during the first 20 years totaled more than 5,000 and the number of individuals nearly 18,000. For the Christmas season of 1930 the total of gifts was $345,790. In many instances contributions came from persons who were themselves out of work and limited as to funds. Trust funds, gifts given in memory of the dead, and repeated contributions from readers who took pride in keeping up the annual totals made "the hundred neediest cases" a notable institution, and its success was a source of real joy to Mr. Ochs.

MONUMENTS HE LEAVES

Mr. Ochs leaves behind him two newspapers—he retained his controlling interest in the Chattanooga Times—the building of which occupied nearly all his energies for nearly all the working years of his life. Both were close to his heart. He could not have existed without intimate daily contact with their affairs. Each was created out of next to nothing by his personal efforts, in the face of discouragements which would have defeated most men and of obstacles which seemed insuperable. These newspapers are his monuments, and he would now be willing to be judged by them.

But his greatest monument is invisible—the principle of clean, temperate, and impartial presentation of news and of higher standards in advertising. These are now such commonplaces of decent newspaper practice that many newspaper men of today may think they have obtained from time immemorial. But they did not secure a foothold easily or automatically; they did not prevail in New York City until Adolph S. Ochs came to town from Chattanooga and risked everything he had on his faith that not only could such a newspaper be published but that there was a public which wanted it.

Mr. Ochs was more than a publisher. He was a man who had faith in humanity and who backed that faith by all the intelligence, all the energy, and all the fighting spirit that was in him.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, Dr. SIROVICH, the gentleman from New York, author of this bill, has accurately stated to the committee the purposes of the bill. It is true that it is technical in character, but with the explanation which he has made I am sure that the bill will be perfectly understood by all. Those of you who were in the last Congress will recall the bill authorizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to extend loans to small industry. You will remember the able fight made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK], together with others, to secure an amendment requiring that loans should be made to persons engaged in the fishing industry. A deplorable condition was depicted.

In the closing hours of the last Congress I think the last bill passed under suspension of the rules was one which came from the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, or at least a counterpart of it which was introduced in the Senate. That counterpart passed the Senate and came over to the House. That bill authorized $2,000,000, as I recall, to be loaned to persons engaged in the fishing industry. It passed the House by an overwhelming vote, and it passed the Senate unanimously. However, it met with a Presidential veto. I do not criticize that veto, but I mention it now to show the need for this legislation, for, as I recall, that bill was vetoed because the Congress had already authorized loans to be made to fishermen in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act.

Mr. FIESINGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. I yield.

Mr. FIESINGER. Was there any different status in these loans than other industrial loans? I do recall loans that could be made to fisheries under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act. Was there any difference between those loans and general industrial loans?

Mr. BLAND. There was no difference under the law as enacted at that time, but—that brings us to this bill—there was a different character of security to be offered for the loan. In the Ship Mortgage Act which was passed in 1920, known as "section 30 of the Merchant Marine Act of 1920", there was a provision whereby a mortgage created under the conditions of that act should be given a preferred status over certain maritime liens.

Mr. FIESINGER. Would the gentleman pardon another interruption?

Mr. BLAND. I yield.

Mr. FIESINGER. Those loans authorized by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation were made not only to vessels, but they could be made upon fishing property; that is, upon their fish houses, their twine, nets, and whatever paraphernalia they may have had.

Mr. BLAND. That is true; but the gentleman will recall that the twine and the nets which go into the water are subject to be destroyed by wind and wave and passing vessels. That security is so precarious that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation found it could not make loans on that security?

Mr. FIESINGER. They did find that?

Mr. BLAND. Yes.

Mr. FIESINGER. Now, this bill, as I understand it, provides for lending entirely upon watercraft; is that true?

Mr. BLAND. Yes.

Mr. FIESINGER. And they may now loan on vessels that are less than 200 tons?

Mr. BLAND. Yes; under this bill, with the exception of those mentioned in the bill. A lien on a vessel is a very peculiar thing. It is so peculiar that without the passage of the Ship Mortgage Act there was difficulty in getting a lien on vessels even of larger size. The maritime laws are different from other laws. Towage and various other liens take priority over the mortgage on the vessel. The result was that when a man had a lien on a vessel he did not know what sort of a lien he had. Other liens were liable to come in and supplant that lien. Therefore, when the Ship Mortgage Act was passed it provided that the lien on vessels over 200 tons should be good against any liens, except against those defined in that act as a preferred maritime lien. A preferred maritime lien is defined in the Ship Mortgage Act as—

A lien arising prior in time to the recording and endorsement of a preferred mortgage in accordance with the provisions of this section; or (2) a lien for damages arising out of tort, for wages of a stevedore when employed directly by the owner, operator, master, ship's husband, or agent of the vessel; for wages of the crew of the vessel; for general average; and for salvage, including contract salvage.

Thus many liens that were previously prior to a mortgage on a vessel were made subordinate to the lien created under the Ship Mortgage Act.

Mr. SUTPHIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. I yield.

Mr. SUTPHIN. Is this applicable to the pound fishermen, a great many of whom are located in the gentleman's district in Virginia, as well as in my own district?

Mr. BLAND. It is applicable to any vessel of the United States, and any vessel of the United States is a vessel over 5 gross tons.

Mr. SUTPHIN. Would that include those boats which those fishermen use? Are they of 5-ton registry?

Mr. BLAND. I am not sure as to what the tonnage is.

Mr. SUTPHIN. But it applies to the industry in general?

Mr. BLAND. It applies to the industry in general.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield that I may make an observation?

Mr. BLAND. Yes.

Mr. DONDERO. The mortgage of a mortgagee of a ship is really placed in no worse position than a mortgagee holding a lien on real estate, because he, too, is subject to the subsequent lien of taxes.

Mr. BLAND. That is true; but the real-estate owner has not so many liens that may acquire priority such as arise in a ship's operations, as, for instance, liens for supplies and other things, that ordinarily would have priority. The result was that before the passage of this Ship Mortgage Act, 1920, any man who had a mortgage on a ship occupied a rather precarious position. This was stated by the admiralty lawyer who appeared at the hearings.

Mr. DONDERO. He could be wiped out by subsequent liens accruing against a ship?

Mr. BLAND. Yes. Now, when the fishermen went down to the R. F. C., after we passed this act, and wanted to get a loan, the R. F. C. desired to make the loans as far as they could within the terms of the act that we passed.

This is the statement of the lawyer who had charge of that particular business in the R. F. C. It appears that when authority was given in the law to make loans to fishermen, Mr. Taber, of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, who had charge of these matters, called upon Mr. Albert T. Gould, a distinguished admiralty lawyer of Boston, Mass., to advise him.

At the hearings Mr. Gould said:

I was retained some time ago by Mr. Taber in behalf of the R. F. C. to advise them with respect to how they could carry out the authority granted to them by Congress to aid the fishing industry. One of the conditions, as you know, is that the R. F. C. should have reasonable assurance—at one time it was expressed as "adequate security"—for the loans that they make to assist the fishing industry. The first problem then was to determine in what reasonable way the Reconstruction Finance Corporation would be able to have adequate security or reasonable assurance that the loans would be paid.

The first thought was that some means would be devised by which they should be secured on the vessel itself, because, in most cases, the owners of the fishing vessels are not in a position to give mortgages on real estate or to pledge collateral for these loans. Their property consists principally of the vessel. So feeling there was no reasonable distinction between a vessel of over 200 tons and a vessel of under 200 tons, no reason why an arbitrary distinction should be made, and in view of the fact that most of the fishing vessels of New England and possibly other parts of the country are of less than 200 tons, I advised the R. F. C. that the best approach, the first step necessary, would be to change the Ship Mortgage Act so as to allow a preferred mortgage to be placed on these fishing vessels; and at their suggestion, I drew a bill which Dr. SIROVICH has introduced.

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. I yield.

Mr. FIESINGER. I am very much interested in this subject because my people have hundreds of thousands of dollars invested in this kind of property. I read in one of the fishermen's magazines probably 2 months ago that the R. F. C. was then prepared to make loans upon property devoted to the fishing industry. I was just wondering whether this bill facilitates the making of those loans, or whether it is a proposition that stands by itself. My point is that the R. F. C. may have considered that it could make no loans even including the classes of property included in this bill, and this bill gives the R. F. C. specific authority to loan upon the classes of property enumerated, but not upon any other property.

Mr. BLAND. The vessel is about the only thing some of them have. The testimony given to our committee a year or two ago was to the effect that their homes were mortgaged, and that they were dependent for credit largely upon the people who sold them twine, the people who furnished their supplies, and the people who dealt with them in marketing their fish; that they were able to get credit for a while from the banks, but the depression came on, and so precarious was their security that, as Mr. Gould said, they cannot now get loans even from private banks without the passage of this law. Why? Because that deed—that mortgage—might be subordinated to other liens arising later. If this bill passes, then a mortgage can be recorded in the office of the collector of customs and a memorandum of it will be carried as a part of the ship's papers, which the vessel's owner may produce. The R. F. C. said that until there was something to make the vessel secure except against the preferred maritime liens, as defined in the Ship Mortgage Act, they could not take the risk of making the loan.

Mr. O'LEARY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. I yield.

Mr. O'LEARY. The evidence before the committee showed the average weight of these fishing vessels was between 40 and 90 tons. Am I not correct?

Mr. BLAND. Yes; I think so. Let me read this language of Mr. Gould:

Without taking any more time, unless there are questions, I would like to say in conclusion, I think there are many very sound reasons why this bill should be enacted for the general benefit of the shipping industry, regardless of the R. F. C.'s particular problem, and further—and further, that unless the bill is enacted it will be impossible for the R. F. C. to give relief to the fishing industry as they very much desire to do, because, unless this act is changed, they cannot get the security which Congress has required them to get.

And this is the part to which I call particular attention:

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BLAND. I yield.

Mr. FIESINGER. It would seem, then, that the R. F. C. does not regard these fishermen as having any property which they can put up as collateral except these vessels that are enumerated in this bill.

Mr. BLAND. It is a fact that the R. F. C. does not regard these fishermen as having sufficient collateral. I may add that the evidence presented before this committee at its hearings last year shows that if there is any group in America today whose individuals may be considered as the "forgotten man" it is the group of men engaged in the sea-food industry.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. I yield.

Mr. KLEBERG. Under this bill I take it, then, fishing vessels used definitely in the fishing business, regardless of their tonnage, would be admissible as collateral.

Mr. BLAND. They must be over 5 tons.

Mr. KLEBERG. They must be over 5 tons?

Mr. BLAND. Yes; because they must be vessels of the United States, and a vessel of the United States is a vessel over 5 tons.

Mr. KLEBERG. I wanted the gentleman to make that clear.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, it was shown in the evidence presented before the committee some years ago—and I wish to impress the House with this fact because it is going to come up in the future until relief is granted to the fishing industry—that the American fisheries today are competing with subsidized foreign fisheries. Their operations are in subsidized vessels and their fish are brought to our markets in subsidized vessels. Evidence was given by men from New England that Japan was subsidizing her fisheries, that Canada was subsidizing her fisheries, and that other foreign nations were subsidizing their fishing fleets. The sardine meal that comes into this country from Japan comes in from a subsidized industry and is shipped to this country in subsidized vessels; yet we expect our fishermen to compete with those men.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. What would be the average cost of the smaller vessels that would be aided under this act?

Mr. BLAND. I am unable to say just what the cost would be.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, fishing vessels between 40 and 80 tons cost between $25,000 and $50,000. The smaller vessels cost about $10,000.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. I yield.

Mr. COLDEN. The gentleman from Virginia mentioned the fact that Japan is subsidizing her fishing industry which competes with American fishermen. It is true also that they pay very low wages and that their currency is depreciated. All of these factors enter into their competition with the American fishing industry on the Pacific coast particularly.

Mr. BLAND. Yes.

Mr. FIESINGER. I did not know that Canada subsidized her fisheries; but there is great feeling in my country along the Great Lakes that one reason Canadian fisheries were able to get business here against our fisheries was because we have a very low tariff.

Mr. BLAND. That is true also. In many cases we have low tariffs and in some cases no tariff at all on fishery products. I would urge the gentleman, if he is interested in the subject, to consider the hearings we held last year under the head of rehabilitation of the fishing industry in which the representative of the Tariff Commission appeared and set out in detail the subsidies that were being granted in other countries.

As I recall, there was mentioned particularly some of the bids that Canada is giving to her fishing people with whom we are in competition.

So far as the possibility of these loans being made, I have here in the hearings distinct, definite, positive, and unequivocal statements on the part of the attorney employed to represent the Reconstruction Finance Corporation that applications had been made and considered; that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was desirous of granting the applications, and the only reason they have been unable to grant them is because without the passage of this bill adequate security does not exist.

Mr. FIESINGER. Can the gentleman say in just a word what the representative of the Tariff Commission said about Canada subsidizing their fishermen and why we have such a low tariff as against those fishing interests?

Mr. BLAND. I do not recall just now. When I say "subsidy", I mean that there were certain aids of some kind that were given. It has been some time since those hearings were held. I set out those aids in the report on the bill that passed last session but which met with a Presidential veto. I pointed out in that report the aid that Canada was giving. It amounted to quite a sum. As I recall, there is also some money that we had to pay to Canada for some obligation, and all of that or the interest on it goes to the fishing industry.

Mr. COLDEN. Is there any distinction in connection with these loans between fishing vessels owned by individuals and fishing vessels that may be owned by a cannery that may have a number of fishing vessels?

Mr. BLAND. Not so far as this bill is concerned. I do not recall the definite language now of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation on that matter. The definite language is in the bill authorizing these loans.

Now, a word about the exception. The only reason any exception is in the bill is because there was some opposition on the part of some towboat operators. We had a conference with Mr. Gould representing the R. F. C.; Mr. Hunter, counsel for the American shipbuilders; and Mr. Tyrer, inspector, Bureau of Navigation. Mr. Tyrer stated he did not know why that 200-ton limitation was written in the original law. Mr. Hunter said he was present at all the hearings and that it was on account of the objections of towboat and other interests of that character. He stated, furthermore, that the bill in the form as introduced should not pass, but there ought to be these exceptions. We said to them, "All right, Mr. Gould and Mr. Hunter; you get together and write your exception which will take care of harbor craft." They had told us that towboats would be placed to considerable trouble. We said, "All right; we will take that into consideration, but we want to take care of these deserving people who need help." Then Mr. Gould and Mr. Hunter wrote this exception. We found that it covered the case of harbor craft and also permitted the loans we desired to be made.

Mr. BLAND. I yield myself 1 additional minute.

Mr. COLDEN. This bill does not exclude loans to ferryboats, as I understand it?

Mr. BLAND. The exception is "towboat, barge, scow, lighter, car float, canal boat, or tank vessel."

Mr. COLDEN. It does not exclude ferryboats?

Mr. BLAND. I should say not under this exception.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ANDREW] has shown a great interest in this bill because he represents Gloucester, Mass., where vessels of this sort more generally hail from. The gentleman from Boston [Mr. MCCORMACK] represents a city where more fish are landed than any other port in the United States.

However, Mr. Chairman, I perhaps represent a larger and a more diversified fishing interest. If you will visualize the southeastern coast of Massachusetts, and the islands and peninsulas thereof, on which are a variety of types of fishing industries, including the shellfish, you will well understand why I feel that I should say something when we are discussing these matters.

Fisherman are the bravest people on the face of the earth. If you do not believe that, I wish you would pay a visit to our section; go with those fishermen at 4 o'clock in the morning out of the harbors and onto the broad ocean, sometimes in rather small dories, and help them with their nets. Help them throw the net overboard in the freezing cold water and later pull them in while the waves are rolling and rocking the boat continuously. You would then have to agree that this is alike a laborious and dangerous procedure.

Observe the fishermen's hands, bruised and cracked from this operation. When you see these bleeding hands you might well say, "Indeed, hard is the lot of a fisherman." He not only suffers hardships but he really braves the elements, and I desire to pay a tribute to him today. At the same time he seems to be the "forgotten man." Many of the past-mentioned "forgotten men", you know, a little later on will wish they have never been remembered when the bills start to come in. [Laughter.] However, we tried to assist these fishermen a year ago. A measure was passed and we thought the R. F. C. would help them, but, of course, immediately its attorneys found how difficult it would be to secure what might be termed "adequate security" for loans. This year the committee has amended the act so that the R. F. C. may demand simply reasonable assurance that they will be paid. Cannot the R. F. C. understand that this Congress has tried to tell them, in no uncertain language, that they might well play the part of the Red Cross, even in giving assistance to some of our needy industries? Do not let us absolutely give away billions of dollars and then feel that the R. F. C. should be overcautious in trying to help suffering industry.

Let us now hope that in cases where the owner of a vessel, small though it may be, wants to borrow perhaps only $100, which may mean much to a fisherman, even though he must pay the cost of examination, the writing of the mortgage, and fees for recording, so that, as the Treasury itself states, he will pay enough in fees so that there would be no loss to the customs department, he may now get that loan. I presume he will be willing to pay such fees even on a loan of $100 or $200, as the banks today do not take this sort of business. Hence I am expressing my hope that you have written this bill so carefully and so liberally that the attorneys for the R. F. C. will now be able to approve loans of this nature. I suppose they will demand a preferred mortgage like other mortgages, will they not, rather than a simple mortgage; and the R. F. C. will require a priority lien? But, Mr. Chairman, in my few remarks I must say it is high time for fish to be welcomed to your table even if a drought and high prices of other foods have to bring this about. If the Almighty must do something to attract our attention to the lot of the fisherman, well and good; but it is time that the fisheries were recognized and that we have help in bringing about some cooperative method of selling fish. Of what advantage is it for the fishermen to catch fish if when they are brought in they have only a Boston or New York market? Until recently, in New York many of our boats were held up at times for $50 or $100 before they even let them unload their fish. We have pleaded for years that an end might be put to occurrences of this sort, but the fishermen could never seem to get any protection or help from their Government.

Mr. Chairman, I am in earnest about this. I would like to attract the attention of the House to the lot of the fishermen, because a little later on I understand there really is a bill of some importance coming before this House which relates to the fishing industry by which the Government will help it to set up some sort of cooperative organization so that in St. Louis and Kansas City and in other inland cities there will be a proper market and by which inspectors of the Government will see to it that the fish are in proper condition when they arrive and before they are sold, so that the confidence of the public may be restored as a result of improved marketing conditions. The marketing of fish is the main trouble of our fishermen today. They must have wider distribution. When this proposition comes before your committee, I plead with you to give it very careful and sympathetic consideration.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. What would the gentleman say about the competition of the fishermen with reference to the importation of fish?

Mr. GIFFORD. I filed a bill the other day, Mr. Chairman, providing for 7½ cents a gallon tax on sea scallops that the Japanese are bringing in. We are worrying about these trade compacts now under consideration. We have been down before a committee of some sort, although we do not understand what sort, which apparently merely hears Senators and Congressmen when they wish to appear. That committee said to the Maine Senators and the New England Congressmen, "We will listen to you and we will hand the information on, if anybody wants it, but we have no particular authority in the matter." Our fishermen today on the Maine coast and on the Massachusetts coast are worrying about all this. Will Canada be allowed to send their products in, while we have no place to which we can go to state our case and obtain relief? This is an invisible sort of Government that is supposed to protect us in the way of tariffs, but does not.

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. FIESINGER. What did my good friend from Massachusetts mean when he said that it cost from $50 to $100 in New York to even unload their fish?

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I trust it is past history, but if the gentleman will read about the organizations, or whatever they may be called, in New York——

Mr. FIESINGER. Racketeering?

Mr. GIFFORD. Racketeering, yes; and I appealed to the Federal Trade Commission not merely once but many times. But I do understand that New York has cleaned house in respect to these things.

Mr. FIESINGER. I am in sympathy with what the gentleman has stated.

Mr. GIFFORD. After pleading and writing the agencies of the Government, it seemed they could not overcome this sort of racketeering, but I hope, and I think, Doctor, these conditions are somewhat remedied and will not be allowed to continue.

Mr. SIROVICH. They have been eliminated.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. May I say to the gentleman that the department of markets under the present administration of Mayor LaGuardia has cleaned up the Fulton Street Market situation thoroughly.

Mr. GIFFORD. But the gentleman does not deny that that situation existed formerly.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I do not deny it. I agree with the gentleman about that. Previous to the present administration in New York City the conditions in the Fulton Street Market were terrible.

Mr. GIFFORD. And the Government for years was of no help.

Mr. SIROVICH. If the gentleman will yield, for the benefit of my friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO], for whom I have the highest admiration, I want to correct him by stating that the Department of Justice, before Mr. LaGuardia was ever elected mayor, had gone into this situation and stopped it.

Mr. FIESINGER. I understood there are some lawsuits in New York with reference to this matter that will be decided in a short time.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. The Department of Justice went in there and procured some indictments, but it was actually the Department of Markets of New York City, under Mayor LaGuardia, that went in there with a strong arm and cleaned out the racketeers.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, in closing my remarks, I repeat that this bill is a small matter, but let us hope that finally, after waiting a whole year, some of these fishermen may be helped through it. I am sure there is unanimity of opinion on this bill, but I want to say to the farmers of the country: Let us arrange it so that we can have an exchange of commodities, so that you will be able to get fish, and the more fish you eat, we promise you, the more we can afford to pay for your meats. It will simply be a fair exchange of commodities, one not being in competition with the other. [Applause.]

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts 2 minutes more.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman stated that these tariffs were written for a committee that had no power—or was referred to a committee that had no power. The fact is that these tariffs are now handled by the distinguished Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, whom we all love and who served with us here. But Secretary Hull is an avowed free trader, unashamed and unafraid. Is not that so?

Mr. GIFFORD. If the gentleman from California will yield me 4 or 5 minutes, I would like to emphasize that.

Mr. WELCH. I yield the gentleman 5 minutes more.

Mr. GIFFORD. In common with other Representatives and Senators from New England, we went to the Post Office Building not long ago. We appeared before a committee, and the United States Senators from the New England States started to relate the conditions that existed in New England. The chairman of the committee, instead of listening to these Senators, said, "We have no authority over that here. This is simply a committee to assemble information, and we will pass it on to somebody representing the State Department who would look into it." It seems to me that this committee was simply a face-saving device.

Then the Senators withdrew, and I imagine that they felt rather humiliated.

The committee had stated that they wanted detailed information. To whom the committee was to give the information was not disclosed to us.

Has it got so bad that United States Senators can go only before a committee without authority and cannot go directly to the authority itself by which the decisions are made? It seems to me that it is a very remarkable situation with which we were confronted.

We do not know who is to make the decision. But we do know that bargaining with Canada is going on, and that if a general bargain can be made it will be "never mind about the New England fisherman or other small interests", so long as it is regarded as satisfactory by the State Department.

Mr. FIESINGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. FIESINGER. I do not want to leave the question of racketeering in New York as it stands, but I will say that the Federal Government is trying to clear up the situation but it has not yet cleared it up, I do not think, in the city of New York.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. If the gentleman will yield, I believe that the gentleman's information is incorrect. The city administration went into the markets, especially the Fulton Market, and every racketeer organization was cleaned out of there by the deputy commissioner of markets, Hon. Michael Fiaschetti, and now there is not a single person who goes in there who has to pay tribute to the racketeers or anybody else.

Mr. FIESINGER. Is the Fulton Street Market a market for salt-water fish?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Yes.

Mr. FIESINGER. My information relates more particularly to the fresh-water-fish business in the city of New York.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Then you have to go after the people who control your cold-storage plants, which do not come under control or jurisdiction of the city administration.

Mr. FIESINGER. Do racketeers control the storage plants?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. No; but the storage plants are controlled by your profiteers who should be regulated by Congress. The city administration has no authority or jurisdiction over them.

Mr. FIESINGER. I do not see how that relates to the racketeering business.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. So far as the racketeering that existed in the Fulton Street Market is concerned, that situation was cleaned up. Credit for that cannot be taken away from the LaGuardia administration.

Mr. FIESINGER. I do not know anything about the Fulton Street Market. I am talking about the fresh-water-fish markets.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes.

Mr. CULKIN. Does not the gentleman believe that the solution of the conditions to which he refers, writing these tariffs in camera, in the dark, would be cured by Congress itself taking over its constitutional duties and writing the tariffs here?

Mr. GIFFORD. Of course, I believe it, even though the present party is in control.

Mr. CULKIN. And does not the gentleman believe there are a good many men on the other side of the aisle who also believe that?

Mr. GIFFORD. Oh, when I speak on the floor against present conditions I think I speak for a large number on the other side of the aisle who would like to say what I do, but who do not feel they ought to because of party loyalty. If I had the time I would like to read a statement from a morning newspaper containing a statement from the Governor of Georgia, but it is outside the question that we are discussing here, and I do not wish to enter into a political debate, except insofar as it bears on the formulation of these tariffs which affect the fishing industry seriously. I also wished to show you the picture of the United States Senators and Representatives spending their valuable time talking to a committee which had no authority. I merely wanted to bring to mind this humiliating situation.

Mr. FIESINGER. What is the difference between a racketeer and a profiteer?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 minute to say that the Department of Commerce is so interested in trying to get the surplus fish off the market to the end that the price may be increased that an advisory committee has been appointed, which is working on that problem at the present time.

I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK].

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I am very much pleased to see this bill up for consideration, and I congratulate our distinguished colleague, the Chairman of the Committee [Mr. BLAND], and the author of the bill, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIROVICH], as well as the other members of the committee on both sides, for their consideration of the bill and for the consideration they have given to all bills referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. I consider this committee one of the finest committees of the House. I have never talked with any Member who has appeared before the committee who does not express the same sentiment that I briefly express on this occasion.

I am very much interested in the fishing activities of the country, the same as my distinguished friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD]. I am not interested because there are any fishermen living in my district, because there are very few, if any, living there. I am interested not only in the fishermen of the district of my distinguished colleague [Mr. GIFFORD], but also in the fishermen of the Great Lakes and of the west coast, the fishermen of the Gulf; not only the fishermen of the South and North Atlantic but the fishermen of all parts of the country. The fishing activity contributed greatly toward the settlement of the Western Hemisphere. It was the fisheries of the North Atlantic which, prior to settlement in any part of the Western Hemisphere, attracted those hardy spirits from European lands to come here and catch fish for sale and take them back to the country from which they came.

They led the way to those who came over later and settled the original Colonies. The fishing activities played a very important part from that angle in bringing to these shores the early settlers, and has also played an important part as one of the basic industries of not only the Colonies but of our country under constitutional government. It is an industry which should receive consideration, and it is very pleasing to me to know that the Congress under a Democratic administration is giving to this basic industry consideration which was denied to it from 1920 to 1933. It is pleasing to know the minority Members have cooperated with the majority Members in their desire to do something for one of the basic activities of our country. I make this brief reference because of the partisan remarks made by my distinguished friend from the cape section of Massachusetts. This bill should pass; it is going to pass. However, I am interested in trying to help the fishing industry on a broader scale. We of New England know the value of fish as a food. I commend it to the people of all of the country. I am informed—and I am a layman—by competent medical authority that fish is more conducive to the health of the consumer than meat. I see here our distinguished colleague, an outstanding member of the medical profession, Dr. SIROVICH, and would like, if he will, to ascertain his professional opinion on that particular question.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. SIROVICH. It might interest my distinguished colleague from Massachusetts to know that cancer, which is ravaging our country more than ever before, is only found amongst the meat-eating nations of the world, whereas amongst the fish-eating nations of the world very little cancer is found, and amongst the vegetable-eating nations of the world we find no cancer; but those people who live upon vegetables are always the servants or slaves of the fish-eating and meat-eating nations. [Laughter.] Therefore I would like to call the attention of my distinguished colleague to the fact that I would recommend to the people of the United States to have at least 1 or 2 days a week devoted to fish eating in order to help the fishermen of our nation.

Mr. McCORMACK. I think the fishermen of all parts of the country are going to be grateful to our distinguished colleague, Dr. SIROVICH, for his contribution.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am particularly interested in considering our problems from a national angle. I dislike to look at things from a sectional angle. We all have our sectional problems; but, somewhere in this wide country of ours, somewhere in the Congress, there is a road which we can travel which will represent the road of national interest and national welfare.

That road exists for finance, for industry, for fishing activities, for employer and employee, for all. Having that in mind, I introduced legislation last year to give to the fishing industry of the United States—not New England or Massachusetts but the fishing industry of the entire country—consideration which prior thereto had been denied. Those amendments were adopted when we passed the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act of last year. This bill is along the same line. This bill gives to the fisherman and the owners of fishing boats considerations which have been denied to them and extended to others owning vessels of 200 gross tons or more, consideration which they should have received before, and to which they are entitled.

I commend Dr. SIROVICH for drafting and introducing this bill. I particularly commend the chairman of the committee and all the members of the committee for the consideration they have extended to what I consider a very meritorious piece of legislation. However, I cannot let my remarks close without the suggestion that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation could do a great deal of good in the administration of this law, and all provisions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, if considerable of the difficulties of obtaining loans are removed. I do not like to be a critic. It is the easiest thing in the world to be a critic. Whatever I may say is not in the nature of criticism but in the nature of what I consider to be a constructive suggestion.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation has regional offices in the various parts of the country. If an application for a loan is made to a regional office, no matter how small, it is examined and investigated, and the regional manager makes his recommendation to the Washington office. Every loan must come to Washington. When it comes down here it is reexamined, so I am reliably informed. After its reexamination, if approved, it goes to a review board. After it goes to the review board it goes to the full board, whether the application is for millions or for a few thousand dollars.

The appointment of a regional manager presupposes confidence in his integrity, his knowledge, and his experience, and it seems to me that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation should permit the regional managers to have discretion and authority in the making of all loans—loans under this act as well as all other provisions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act—up to at least $10,000, if not $25,000. The main purpose of that act, which was first passed upon the recommendation of former President Hoover and which has been extended under the present administration, and which is a very fine piece of legislation, was for the purpose of assisting in reemployment, in addition to saving our banks, our railroads, and our insurance companies. If we are going to assist in reemployment and carry out effectively the amendments which we have made, we must make it attractive for the small business man to make application for a loan.

Mr. CULKIN. Has the language of the statute been changed? The law says the loan shall be made on adequate security.

Mr. McCORMACK. That has been changed this year to "reasonable assurance." It has been liberalized.

Mr. CULKIN. Has that legislation been passed?

Mr. McCORMACK. That has been passed, but what I am addressing myself to is that regional managers should have authority up to a certain amount, to make and disburse loans without the necessity of sending them down to Washington and going through three steps, together with the delay and expense which ensues. If that is done we will help the small business man in the way that Congress intended. He will make his application for loans where he cannot get them from a bank, for reemployment and for capital purposes, and it will be of tremendous assistance. It will be an incentive to the small business man to make applications, and it is going to place the responsibility where it belongs, to at least a limited extent, namely, upon the regional manager, who is acquainted with local conditions and the character of the applicant, whose appointment, as I have said, presupposes confidence in his integrity, his knowledge, his honesty, and his experience. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] has again expired.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. COLDEN].

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Chairman, living in one of the principal fishing sections of the Pacific coast, I have been very deeply interested in this measure. San Pedro, Calif., is the center of an extensive fresh-fish market and also of a very important tuna-canning industry. Tuna is known as the "chicken of the sea." It is the kind of fish that is preferred for salads, sandwiches, and things of that sort.

We also have important sardine fishing at San Pedro, including the canning industry, and the development of it is one of the most interesting romances of industry that I have ever heard. Some years ago one of the Van Camps, of Indianapolis, Ind., of pork-and-bean fame, came to San Pedro and bought a tuna cannery. This cannery was only operated a few months during the year for the reason that the tuna season is short.

As an observer of that community, Mr. Van Camp noted that fishermen during the dull season were busy bringing in sardines that were used for fish meal, chicken feed, and fertilizer. He observed that was great waste and loss of a very valuable food. He made inquiries as to why the canners of our community were not canning sardines. The answer was that at that time sardines were preserved in olive oil and that it was rather an expensive article on the Pacific coast in quantities sufficient for canning. In driving around the country he noticed also that many acres of tomatoes were going to waste. The larger tomatoes were sold on the market, but there were tons and tons of smaller tomatoes rotting in the fields. So he put his chemists to work on research and evolved a system of preserving and canning sardines in tomato sauce.

This method proved a success, and he began to put them on the market with the result that the California sardine packed in tomato sauce was so much cheaper than the olive-oil-packed product that it soon supplanted the other brands in our market. In course of time the market expanded throughout the United States, and a number of canners engaged in this new business. Because of careless packing the market was demoralized for a time until the canners got together and set up a standard for this product. During the World War the canned sardine from San Pedro invaded the eastern markets, principally New York, and the attention of the fishermen on the New England coast was called to this new industry. The New England canners sent a committee to investigate this industry at San Pedro, and the result was that they built a large cannery for canning sardines at San Pedro. This product was so popular it finally invaded the markets of Europe. The Norwegian sardine canners took notice and sent investigators to inspect the industry at San Pedro and on the Pacific coast; and they also built a large sardine cannery at San Pedro at Los Angeles Harbor. Today it is a very important industry, and the tomato-packed product enjoys a world-wide market.

Great quantities of these sardines are shipped to South America, Africa, and to the Orient, including the tin mines of the Malay Peninsula where we have the peculiar spectacle of the tin workers sending their tin to the United States and the tin in turn, or at least a portion of it, being shipped back to them in the form of containers for the California sardines, which is a staple article of their food.

I am informed by the Honorable WILLIAM I. SIROVICH, the ranking member of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and also the eminent physician of New York City, that the sardine product of our canneries is much superior to that of the imported product, particularly that of Spain and Portugal. Dr. SIROVICH informs me that the sanitary condition of the American canneries is far superior to that of their competitors. The fish in the American canneries is handled very largely by machinery while that in many of the foreign canneries by the hands of human beings, many of whom are lacking in cleanliness and others afflicted with disease. For this reason he highly recommends the American product as far more wholesome for human consumption.

One of my colleagues referred to the hardships and the dangers of the fisherman of our country. He speaks of their courage and their ability to breast the storms of the seas. This reminds me of a tragedy that occurred to the fishermen of my home town.

One of the vessels of the fishing fleet of San Pedro was known as the Belle Isle. It departed from San Pedro and stopped at San Diego for a brief period and left that port on June 11, 1934. This fishing vessel had embarked for the Panamanian waters with 12 men, 10 of whom were American citizens, including Captain Gabelich, all residents of San Pedro. Although this vessel was equipped with a radio, no word has ever been received as to the fate of this vessel and its crew of 12. Ten of these men were married, and today there are 10 widows and 18 fatherless children in San Pedro waiting for their loved ones who, in all probability, will never return. This is but an example of the tragedies of the seas with which our fishermen are constantly confronted.

Not only because of their great contribution to the supply of a valuable food and its various byproducts but also because of their heroic nature and the hazardous traditions of their vocation do I wish to support this measure and enable the owners of the vessels of from 5 tons to 200 tons to have the same privileges of our R. F. C. loans as the greater companies engaged in the commerce of the seas. I see no good reason why any discrimination should exist against the American fisherman who occupies such an important place in our economic life.

The competition of foreign countries has been discussed today. The California fishing industry, both canners and fishermen, feel keenly the unfair competition from Japan. The Japanese Government not only subsidizes the fishing industry but the wage scale and the standard of living is so utterly low in Japan as to be able to economically destroy the tuna industry of California. In addition, the depreciated currency of Japan has made ineffective our tariff barriers to a great extent. I have heard the Members of Congress from various States, particularly those of Massachusetts, speaking of the Japanese competition in the textile industry. They are only beginning to realize the deadly competition from Japan with which the fishing industry of California has had to contend for some time. While the proper tariff protection of our California fishing industry is not germane to this bill, yet it is of such deep significance that I refer to it at this time as an imperative necessity.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, since coming here in January and having for the first time the privilege of associating with the members of the committee having charge of this bill, especially with the chairman of that committee, I have learned the value of humility. The broadness of knowledge of the subject in hand and the sincerity of the chairman and those who have served previously on the committee, their ability to determine the necessity for, and apply the remedy, is so apparent that we may well be guided by their counsel.

Anything that may be said is not offered by way of criticism of any kind, and it is only a long, broad, general principle, which seems to be the popular method. Any suggestion made here is in the spirit of helpfulness and is directed, not to the attention of the committee nor even perhaps to the Members of the House, but more especially to the gentlemen at the other end of the Avenue, because, although it seems impossible, it does appear that they may have neglected one or two opportunities to spend a little more money, to help the "underprivileged", to do something for those who are not leading "the more abundant life."

The Democratic platform of 1932 was something to excite the admiration of every citizen and, when the President announced that he was for it 100 percent, when he went about the country seeking renomination upon the principles there laid down and pledging adherence thereto, even Republicans were tempted to, and did, in large numbers, by the millions, we may say, desert their party, agreeing with the Democratic candidate and his policy as announced, and, relying thereon and having faith in his ability to carry out those plans, elected him to the high office he now holds.

Unfortunately, a change has come about. It is not for me to say that he has changed his mind, that he has forgotten the manner in which he secured his election, but someone with different ideas seems to have charge of the legislation. It does not, at least, follow the lines which were laid down in that platform, the ideas advocated in his campaign speeches. Much was said about economy in Government affairs, about the balancing of the Budget, about the "underprivileged." We all remember it, even though the platform itself, with all its fine declarations, has been abandoned, if not forgotten.

Today I wish to take a leaf from his book and for one moment speak to you about the lowly fishermen. I hold no brief for the trout fishermen.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Is the gentleman referring to the lowly fishermen as being among the class known as the "forgotten man"?

Mr. HOFFMAN. The gentleman from Michigan has been here longer than have I.

The fisherman to whom I refer belongs to that class which has been partially, not wholly, forgotten. The gentleman may know others, although there cannot be many who have not received benefits from Government money. The only man I know of who has been completely forgotten is the taxpayer.

I was not referring to the boy with the cheek of tan, but to the boy with the tomato can, the boy who carries the angleworms in a little tin can. True, he has not always, in all places, been forgotten. In Michigan, if he sells angleworms along the roadside, he needs a license and he pays a sales tax; and if some of the legislation now proposed by Members here is enacted, he will need a Federal license and he will pay a tax on his little financial transaction.

Some Member—I think it was one of the minority members of the committee—said that the hand that rocked the cradle was the hand that ruled the Nation; but I have always thought that it was the boy who carried the fishpole and the bait can who was called upon to save the Nation.

Let me repeat: I hold no brief for the trout fisherman—the man with the fancy rod, the creel, the reel, the landing net; the man who buys his fish of the boy who catches them from the stream along which they are both fishing. You gentlemen who fish know how it is; I am sure the gentleman from Michigan does.

Nor do I hold a brief for the fellow who fishes off the Florida Keys from the power yacht; the millionaire who fishes in style. He does not belong to the class which leads a "more abundant life."

True, the President fishes in that vicinity during his vacation, which he so richly deserves, and I am not referring to him, for the last election gave him a catch the handling of which entitles him to not one but several vacations. He and the gentlemen on that side of the House who attempt from day to day to have the members of their party follow a consistent course have troubles, difficulties, which must try the patience of a Job—and vacations are theirs by right.

Gentlemen who have spoken here have referred to the fishermen who own and operate small boats in the fishing business along the eastern coast; and all that they have said, tending to point out the respect which is due to those men, their hardships and their needs for assistance, we can well endorse and adopt.

Michigan has a little water of its own. In fact, there are lakes on the north, the south, the east, and the west of it, even though it has Indiana on the south and Wisconsin on the northwest.

The fishermen of Michigan who ply their trade on the Great Lakes, especially those who fish in Lake Superior, earn all they are able to get and, at small cost, supply thousands of tons of food to the markets of surrounding States. Their hardships are as great as, the dangers which surround them equal to, those of any other fishermen on any body of water, and they, too, are entitled to the relief which this bill will give, if it be adopted.

But it is not to them that reference is now made. This angleworm fisherman is the one in mind. Has that subject been investigated by the gentlemen at the other end of the Avenue? Have any of them ever tried to dig angleworms out of dry ground in hot weather, while the mosquitoes gathered 'round? Have any of the gentlemen over on the other side of the Capitol investigated the possibilities of creating employment by buying fishing tackle for all the boys and girls of the Nation who would like to go fishing? Why fool around with some of these other plans for the spending of the taxpayers' money? Here is a class that offers unparalleled opportunities for spending.

I understood the gentleman from Texas to say a while ago that his State was being neglected. But they have boys and girls in Texas. Surely they have water on the south. The Rio Grande River still must have water in it.

Nor is it so very far to the Mississippi. Think of all the colored brethren along all the docks and wharves and landings of the Mississippi and the Missouri Rivers, the ideal, contented, long-suffering but ever-patient and persistent catfish fisherman. Does he need help? Should he be given assistance? There is also the "kingfish", but I am not in favor of appropriating any money for the "kingfish."

Mr. EKWALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. EKWALL. Is it not a fact that in Michigan the men who tell the biggest fish stories are sent to Congress?

Mr. HOFFMAN. The gentleman from Oregon was born and brought up at Ludington, in Michigan. He perhaps knows more about the subject to which he refers than do I. From what I have heard the gentleman say while here in Congress, I think perhaps his view is true. I also believe that he has never strayed, although he is a member of the judiciary of his adopted State, from the lessons he learned as a boy fishing from the piers along Lake Michigan. Whether his version of the veracity of a fisherman is the true one, whether that is the reason the people of Oregon sent him to Congress, I know not.

Mr. Chairman, I read in my home papers the advertisements where dancing and bridge lessons are being provided at public expense. The daily tells us that over in New York they are spending or have spent $3,000,000 for the same purpose. Do I have that right?

Mr. SIROVICH. That is the administration of the present mayor of New York doing that.

Mr. KNUTSON. It is Government money.

Mr. SIROVICH. It is money given to the mayor of New York.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Is that the taxpayers' money, or is that some more of your printed money?

Mr. KNUTSON. That is the money that Hopkins said was spent for things that we were "too damned dumb to understand" so far as the finer things in life were concerned.

Mr. HOFFMAN. That is what I am getting at.

Now, take this fishing business. You can buy a cane pole for 10 cents; you can buy 40 or 50 feet of linen line for 20 cents; you can buy a nickel's worth of sinkers and a dime's worth of fishhooks and with this equipment send these boys out along the streams to fish. They are out in the sunshine or the rain growing healthy and strong, learning lessons from nature; and you will be keeping them out of the reform schools and out of prison by giving them an outdoor education.

Mr. KNUTSON. They spent $250,000 preparing a relief map showing the movement of the people in the second millennium.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Is the gentleman talking about money or something else?

Mr. KNUTSON. I am talking about the money that was spent over in New York.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I do not know anything about the matter to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. KNUTSON. I am talking about the second millennium. I had never heard of it before either.

Mr. HOFFMAN. The gentleman is never going to get there anyway. Do not the Members know that we are on our way to national bankruptcy? That, in fact, we are already there?

Mr. KNUTSON. We are there now and do not know it.

Mr. HOFFMAN. But we are happy about it.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CULKIN. I do not know whether the gentleman is in favor of the disbursement of $30,000 or $42,000 in order to furnish a symphony orchestra for South Carolina.

Mr. HOFFMAN. The gentleman asks the question, Am I?

Mr. CULKIN. Yes.

Mr. HOFFMAN. No; I am in favor of giving this money to the boys who want to go fishing. The buildings housing the symphony orchestra may get burned down. Why put the orchestra in there? Keep them outdoors, put them along the streams so they can fish, and incidentally they can go swimming. Think of the saving in bathtubs and soap!

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FLETCHER. My understanding is that the gentleman advocates that the money shall be used to buy fishpoles for the boys?

Mr. HOFFMAN. No; no. Far be it from me to make that recommendation! What am I advocating?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I am trying to offer the suggestion to the fellows over here who are wasting the people's money that we quit all this foolishness. If I had my way about the matter, we would balance the Budget. That is my theory of government.

I was just thinking that if they wanted to spend money and did not know what to do with it, they might follow this plan. For instance, there is a billion dollars left over from the last appropriation which they cannot spend. They are appropriating almost $5,000,000,000 more, and I am afraid we are getting too dumb to understand how to spend it.

The Congress, 2 years ago, appropriated more money for welfare and work relief than the departments have been able to spend, if the information we receive is correct. The committee having charge of these bills apparently had more time than it could use, hence these observations. It was just another thought on how more money might be spent.

My suggestion would be to cut it all out; go back to the old-fashioned, if hard, way of keeping our national expenditures within our national income; of living up to the President's statement, in substance, that any other course meant disaster. Let big business be regulated, but not in such a way as to destroy the small business man. Let the Government abandon the effort to control nature and the production of crops and cease levying tribute upon those willing in a decent, honest manner, to work and pay their own way through this world.

Let us be not content with merely acknowledging the truth of the President's statement that he was not willing—

> That the vitality of our people be further sapped by the giving of cash, of market baskets, of a few hours of weekly work cutting grass, raking leaves, or picking up papers in the public parks.

Let deeds follow the thought and the words and create here once more a nation of independent workers.

Mr. FLETCHER. According to the RECORD, over half of the Members on that side voted for the $4,000,000,000.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I do not think so; no.

Mr. KNUTSON. No. There are not as many fools as that over here.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO].

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, I was greatly interested in what the distinguished and able chairman of the committee [Mr. BLAND] had to say about the life of the fishermen along the Atlantic coast. I might add that everything that was said about the life of those men can be said of the life of the fishermen on the Great Lakes. They all face the perils of wind and wave.

Mr. Chairman, I am not only interested in this bill but I am going to support it, and I am going to support it because it liberalizes the law and makes it possible for the little man to obtain a loan.

On the Great Lakes I wonder if there is a single fishing boat of 200 tons or more. They are practically all smaller boats; and under the law as it now stands I doubt if any ship on the Great Lakes could get a loan. However, this bill will make it possible for the owner of such a boat to get a loan.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SIROVICH. The testimony before our committee shows that pretty nearly every fishing boat is between 40 and 90 tons.

Mr. DONDERO. I think that is correct.

Not long ago we had a bill before this House to appropriate money to preserve the oyster industry of this Nation. I have not an oyster bed within 500 miles of my district in Michigan. I supported that bill for the reason that the question of food for mankind was involved in the measure. I think that same question enters into this bill, because any bill that makes it possible for a man to earn his living by the collection of food is a bill in which I know the public is interested.

I was interested in the statement regarding the competition with Canada. Canada is just across the river from my district. I am wondering whether this Nation can afford even to consider a reduction of the tariff on fish when it comes to this great industry which affects nearly every State of the Union. Perhaps the tariff is not high enough in this particular regard, and what applies to Canada applies to some of the foreign nations of the world.

I want to direct the attention of the chairman to section 5 of the bill and ask him a question. What would happen if a fishing industry was a partnership or an association or a corporation? Could it obtain a loan under this bill, which, as it now stands, simply applies to an American citizen? Did the committee give that question consideration?

Mr. BLAND. The committee did not give consideration to the applicant, because the bill simply amends existing law.

Mr. DONDERO. The reason I ask this question is this. On the Great Lakes many of the fishing industries are corporations, partnerships, or associations made up of citizens of Michigan and I am wondering whether the language would exclude them, and also those along the Atlantic and the Pacific and the Gulf coasts.

Mr. SIROVICH. If the gentleman will permit, the language of the bill is the same language, word for word, as the language in the Ship Mortgage Act of 1920, as modified in 1928, and the only change in verbiage is with reference to the tonnage of less than 200 tons and the excluding language, "other than a towboat, barge, scow, lighter, car float, canal boat, or tank vessel, of less than 200 gross tons." This is the only new language in the bill.

Mr. DONDERO. The question still remains, if a corporation asked for a loan under this bill could they get it?

Mr. SIROVICH. Of course, they could.

Mr. BLAND. I have not the slightest doubt of that, because we are amending the Ship Mortgage Act, which is the act under which these ship companies get their money. I do not think there is any doubt about that.

Mr. DONDERO. That is the only question I have in mind and I understand there is no question about it and none will be excluded so long as they are worthy.

Mr. BLAND. I do not think they will be.

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FIESINGER. There is one matter I would like to have clarified. It is not the purpose of the Government, as I understand, to reduce the tariff on fish, but I thought this might have been implied or inferred from what the gentleman has said.

Mr. DONDERO. No; not necessarily. The statement was prompted by what was said this afternoon regarding the competition of the fishing industry of this country with Japan and with Canada, and, I think, also, with some European countries.

Mr. BLAND. I think what the gentleman refers to is the reciprocal tariff agreement and the statement that no such agreement should be made whereby large importations of fish might come into this country. I may say that so far as that is concerned, while the committee has taken no action on it, I registered, in due and formal course, my protest against any such action.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. COLDEN. Does not the gentleman believe that the competition with Japan, with its subsidized fishing industry, its extremely low wages, and its depreciated currency, is much more of a menace to American fishermen than the Canadian industry?

Mr. DONDERO. Very much more so. There is no comparison at all between the laboring man of Canada and the laboring man of Japan.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 30, subsection D, subdivision (a), of the act of June 5, 1920, known as the "Ship Mortgage Act, 1920", be amended by striking out the words "of 200 gross tons and upwards", and adding immediately following the words "vessels of the United States" the following: "(other than towboat, barge, scow, lighter, car float, canal boat, or tank vessel, of less than 200 gross tons)", and as so amended be reenacted so as to read as follows:

"A valid mortgage which, at the time it is made, includes the whole of any vessel of the United States (other than a towboat, barge, scow, lighter, car float, canal boat, or tank vessel, of less than 200 gross tons), shall, in addition, have, in respect to such vessel and as of the date of the compliance with all the provisions of this subdivision, the preferred status given by the provisions of subsection M, if—

"(1) The mortgage is endorsed upon the vessel's documents in accordance with the provisions of this section;

"(2) The mortgage is recorded as provided in subsection C, together with the time and date when the mortgage is so endorsed;

"(3) An affidavit is filed with the record of such mortgage to the effect that the mortgage is made in good faith and without any design to hinder, delay, or defraud any existing or future creditor of the mortgagor or any lienor of the mortgaged vessel;

"(4) The mortgage does not stipulate that the mortgagee waives the preferred status thereof; and

"(5) The mortgagee is a citizen of the United States."

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House, with the recommendation that it be passed.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7205) to amend the Ship Mortgage Act of 1920, otherwise known as "section 30" of the Merchant Marine Act of 1920, approved June 5, 1920, to allow the benefits of said act to be enjoyed by owners of certain vessels of the United States of less than 200 gross tons, and had directed him to report the same back with the recommendation that it do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BLAND, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

FEDERAL OLD-AGE BENEFIT, ETC.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I present the following privileged report for printing under the rule.

The resolution is as follows:

House Resolution 197

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of H. R. 7260, a bill to provide for the general welfare by establishing a system of Federal old-age benefits, etc. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 20 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the Chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Ways and Means, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman state if he is going to call this bill tomorrow?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes; I will call it up the first thing in the morning.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and include therein a speech made by my colleague, Mr. HARTER, of Ohio, before the members of the Jewish War Veterans Association, on the subject of national defense.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following address of my colleague, Mr. HARTER, of Ohio, before the members of the Jewish War Veterans' Association April 7, 1935:

Commander, members of the Jewish War Veterans, including those who are in full health and those who are hospitalized as a result of their unfortunate experiences during the World War, and their friends everywhere:

It affords me great pleasure to participate in your program in celebrating what has come to be known as "Army Day", and is also the eighteenth anniversary of the entrance of the United States into the World War.

Much has happened since that eventful day in early April of 1917 when our country entered the conflict against Germany. We engaged in that struggle hoping that the World War would be the last war and that we were fighting to make the world safe for democracy. Unfortunately, wars are not at an end, and the world has never been so unsafe for free nations as it is today. Members of patriotic societies, like the Jewish War Veterans, doubtless will continue to seek information with which to combat the misleading propaganda of those ill-advised persons who would make our Nation defenseless.

The Chairman of the Military Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives, Hon. JOHN J. MCSWAIN, of South Carolina, is one of the stanchest friends of a safe-and-sane policy of national defense. He was to have been your guest speaker upon this program, but his duties require him to be in constant attendance upon the session of the House of Representatives this afternoon. Doubtless he is engaged at this minute in urging the passage by the House of Representatives of the McSwain bill to prevent profiteering during a war period.

Mr. MCSWAIN has given years of study to the elimination of excessive profits during periods of national emergency, and the bill which he sponsors, and which may be passed in the House of Representatives yet today, represents his earnest effort to keep the United States out of war.

As a member of the House Military Affairs Committee, Mr. MCSWAIN has requested me to extend to all those who believe in adequate national defense, and yet wish to prevent, insofar as possible, the entrance of this country into war, his greetings and felicitations.

All of us who have any connection with our national defense take a justifiable pride in the very marked progress that has been made in recent months in building up the strength and morale of the Army. There is constant agitation for more and better planes, with higher performance in speed and ceiling; for modernization of the service of supply for the Army; for motorization and for giving us a small but highly developed, fully equipped Army which is capable of large expansion upon short order and which, when so expanded, will provide us with a national defense force sufficient for most any national emergency. A majority of our citizens are in accord with these plans. They realize the conditions of unrest existing in the world today.

We have fire and police departments in our cities so as to prevent conflagration and crime. We must be prepared from the standpoint of national defense, so that we may not become involved in a world-wide war, nor so poorly prepared that we might be at the mercy of some aggressor nation.

Safe, sane, reasonable, and efficient national defense preparedness is necessary for the promotion of true and lasting peace. Money wisely spent for an adequate defense may prevent war and will go a long way toward maintaining our national integrity.

When we see the leading nations of the world preparing for war, and when we realize that through dictatorships and forms of government, absolute in nature, people of many nations do not have the right to express themselves, through their elected representatives, upon this grave matter of a declaration of war, we have some conception of how easily the world could become embroiled in a major conflict.

The storm clouds of war hover over Europe. We covet the territory of no nation, but we must be alert to the realities of the situation. As a great democracy, believing in the principles of constitutional government and free institutions, we know that we must have adequate national defense.

Those of us who had an opportunity to view the armed forces of our country today and saw the demonstration given by the general headquaters air force and the inspiring sight of the thousands who belong to other branches of the service as they marched down Constitution Avenue here in Washington felt that our military forces truly represent the spirit of America. They are to preserve peace, not to make war; they are for your defense and my defense, not for the purpose of waging aggressive warfare.

We know that in years gone by, when we have been faced with war, our unpreparedness was apparent to everyone. Most of us are familiar with what occurred upon our entrance into war with Spain in 1898. Our inadequate and failure of supply led to many hardships and much suffering among our troops.

At the time of our entrance into the World War, while we took measures that resulted in the training and production of the finest troops available anywhere, the cost and the profiteering that took place is well known to all of us.

We who are interested in national defense wish to see it achieved in such a way that it is adequate; that it is efficient and economical. Should we ever be faced with another war, forced upon us because of the aggression of some foreign power, let us take from the pages of history and the past the lesson of the necessity of being prepared should such an emergency arise.

The purpose of this day and the anniversary which we celebrate is not for the glorification of war. Rather it is to focus attention on our national-defense forces and to call to the attention of the people the constitutional duty of our Government to maintain an adequate common defense.

Since the World War many of the veterans who were participants have kept up their interest in problems of national defense by becoming members of the Officers' Reserve Corps, or have identified themselves with various veterans' groups and organizations, which are among the finest influences we have in promoting national defense and the cause of lasting and enduring peace.

May I express the hope that all veterans will use their influence in the various communities throughout the United States to the end that elected representatives of the people will provide adequate appropriations for a well-developed army and plan of national defense.

With all of the turmoil and uncertainty that exists the world over, it is particularly heartening to be able to tell the American people that at no time since the World War has Congress been so much alert to the dangers of inadeqaute national defense and so ready to make the appropriations and sacrifices to put our Nation in a position of being able to protect itself, no matter what may happen.

Let us approach the future with the same spirit that has emanated a liberty-loving nation ever since the adoption of our Constitution. Fortunately we are isolated geographically from Europe and we have not inherited the age-old animosities and racial differences that exist between the various people of Europe.

We want to be a good neighbor to all the world, but above all, we wish to be a self-respecting nation, one that has the interest of its own citizens at heart, and a nation that will provide for its own people the immunity from attack, protection from disturbance, so that they may enjoy their liberties and follow their vocations in safety and security.

I have been privileged this afternoon to address you under the auspices of the Jewish War Veterans of the United States, through the courtesy of the National Broadcasting Co.

This organization of veterans of our wars, founded in 1896 by veterans of the War between the States, today numbers among its members survivors of all our wars. I am privileged to bear testimony to the true patriotism, loyalty, and devotion of these citizens of the Jewish faith, in war and peace, to our country.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 7131) to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to dispose of certain lighthouse reservations, and for other purposes, and I ask that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Commerce is hereby authorized to convey to the State of California, for public-park purposes, the Morro Rock Lighthouse Reservation located at the entrance of Estero Bay, Coast of California, comprising about 30.56 acres, with the exception of three areas each 100 feet square located, respectively, on the northern side, the highest point of the rock, and the southerly side, together with rights of ingress and egress thereto as may be necessary for the establishment and maintenance of future aids to navigation at these points. The deed of conveyance shall describe by metes and bounds insofar as practicable the portion of the reservation transferred, and the conditions imposed by section 35 of this act.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of Commerce is authorized to reconvey to the State of Delaware the abandoned lighthouse reservation about 10 acres in extent, known as the "Delaware Breakwater Range Rear Lighthouse Reservation", Del., the land being no longer required for lighthouse purposes, as stipulated in the original deed of conveyance to the United States.

SEC. 3. The Secretary of Commerce is authorized to convey to the City Commission of the City of St. Augustine, Fla., for public park purposes, that portion of the Anastasia Island Lighthouse Reservation, Fla., which is not required to be retained for lighthouse purposes, consisting of lots 1 and 2, section 21, township 7 south, range 30 east, Tallahassee, Fla., excepting that part of lot 2 between the 5-acre lighthouse tract and the hard-surfaced road, together with a perpetual easement for beams of light across any part of the land that may be between the lighthouse and the sea: Provided, That no conveyance of the property shall be made until such time as the City Commission of the City of St. Augustine shall have agreed in writing to relieve the United States from being a party to any claims or litigation through the acquisition of the land in question by the city of St. Augustine, and that satisfactory agreements are reached with holders of record to subdivided lands in said lots 1 and 2 prior to 1923. The deed of conveyance shall describe by metes and bounds the exact portions of the reservation transferred, and the conditions imposed by section 35 of this act.

SEC. 4. The Secretary of Commerce is authorized to convey to the State of Florida for public-roadway purposes that portion of the Crooked River Range Lighthouse Reservation, Fla., near the southern boundary of the reservation, which is not required to be retained for lighthouse purposes, consisting of a strip of land approximately 66 feet in width and 500 feet in length. The deed of conveyance shall describe by metes and bounds the portion of the reservation transferred and the conditions imposed by section 35 of this act.

SEC. 5. Page 18, line 12, change section 35 to 37.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by striking out section 5.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, line 19, strike out all of section 5.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment: Page 10, line 8, after the word "Atlantic", strike out the word "City" and insert the word "County."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 8, after the word "Atlantic", strike out the word "City" and insert the word "County."

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, this is merely a change of unit from city to county. The purpose of the bill is to convey this property to the chosen freeholders of Atlantic County. The way the bill reads it refers to the Board of Freeholders of Atlantic City. There is no such board. The Bureau of Lighthouses informs the committee it should read "Atlantic County."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HART: Page 10, line 12, after the word "to", strike out the word "the" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Lower."

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, the section authorizes the Secretary of Commerce to convey to the Township of Cape May County, in the State of New Jersey, certain property. There is no such township as Cape May County. It was the intention of the Department that the conveyance should be made to Lower Township, in Cape May County. That is the effect of the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the numbering of the paragraphs up to section 35 be changed in accordance with the amendment.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

The Clerk reported the committee amendments.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the numbers of the paragraphs in the last section of the bill be changed to conform with the amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

RIGHT OF CERTAIN VESSELS TO ENGAGE IN COASTWISE TRADE

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 115) to amend section 27 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1920.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia calls up a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 27 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1920 (U. S. C., title 46, sec. 883), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 27. That no merchandise shall be transported by water, or by land and water, on penalty of forfeiture thereof, between points in the United States, including Districts, Territories, and possessions thereof embraced within the coastwise laws, either directly or via a foreign port, or for any part of the transportation, in any other vessel than a vessel built in and documented under the laws of the United States and owned by persons who are citizens of the United States, or vessels to which the privilege of engaging in the coastwise trade is extended by sections 18 or 22 of this act: Provided, That no vessel having at any time acquired the lawful right to engage in the coastwise trade, either by virtue of having been built in or documented under the laws of the United States, and later sold foreign in whole or in part, or placed under foreign registry, shall hereafter acquire the right to engage in the coastwise trade: Provided further, That this section shall not apply to merchandise transported between points within the continental United States, excluding Alaska, over through routes heretofore or hereafter recognized by the Interstate Commerce Commission for which routes rate tariffs have been or shall hereafter be filed with said Commission when such routes are in part over Canadian rail lines and their own or other connecting water facilities: Provided further, That this section shall not become effective upon the Yukon River until the Alaska Railroad shall be completed and the Shipping Board shall find that proper facilities will be furnished for transportation by persons citizens of the United States for properly handling the traffic."

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, this bill is to prevent certain ships that have been sold to foreign owners—ships which were American-built, some built during the war, since operating abroad—from being brought back into this country and reentering the coastwise trade.

I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BLAND: Strike out the final period, insert in lieu thereof a colon, and add the following:

"Provided further, That this section shall not apply to the transportation of merchandise loaded on railroad cars or to motor vehicles with or without trailers, and with their passengers or contents when accompanied by the operator thereof, when such railroad cars or motor vehicles are transported in any railroad-car ferry operated between fixed termini on the Great Lakes as a part of a rail route, if such car ferry is owned by a common carrier by water and operated as part of a rail route with the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and if the stock of such common carrier by water, or its predecessor, was owned or controlled by a common carrier by rail prior to June 5, 1920, and if the stock of the common carrier owning such car ferry is, with the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, now owned or controlled by any common carrier by rail, and if such car ferry is built in and documented under the laws of the United States."

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, the House, by unanimous consent, passed a few days ago an amendment to section 27. That amendment has gone to the Senate. This bill also amends section 27. The amendment that was passed was an amendment that provided in respect to the Great Lakes car ferries. This is the same section that is amended, and this repeats the section just as if that amendment were not in. If we were to pass this bill, and it should go over to the Senate, and it should be passed there, after the other bill had passed, we would undo all that we have done in the passage of the other bill. This simply tacks onto this bill section 27, the amendment that passed this House by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR CONSTRUCTION OF BRIDGE ACROSS OHIO RIVER NEAR CAIRO, ILL.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 1308) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Cairo, Ill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of the bridge across the Ohio River at or near Cairo, Ill., authorized to be built by the Cairo Bridge Commission by the act of Congress entitled "An act creating the Cairo Bridge Commission and authorizing said commission and its successors to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Cairo, Ill.", approved April 13, 1934, are hereby extended 1 and 3 years, respectively, from April 13, 1935.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a small poem by Mr. Fucci in relation to the veterans of the World War.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following poem, by Mr. Louis V. Fucci, in relation to the veterans of the World War:

REVIEW OF THE BIG PARADE

1917–1935

By Louis V. Fucci

'Twas only yesterday your sons,
Sons of liberty and democracy,
Came marching down our main streets
To the tune of martial air.

These boys of the ghetto and social world
Ne'er gave thought of self
As onward they carried with dauntless courage
To fight for your sake and my sake.

Here and there along the curb
Thousands of voices heard rejoicing, crying:
"Nothing's too good for our boys;
We shall ne'er forget them; e'er remember them."

Time and peace healed all ills!
The knell of war hath ceased!
Soldiers of peace returning, chanting:
"Peace on earth, good will to men."

Here they come! See them!
Shell shocked and shrapnel torn,
Gassed, maimed, and weaponless,
From the slimy trenches returning.

Here, there, everywhere—o'er the land—
Millions of voices heard rejoicing, saying:
"Nothing's too good for our boys;
We shall care for them as in war and in peace."

United to family ties again,
Among loved ones together brought;
Some made happy; some to grieve;
But saddest of all were they to be forgot,
By those for whom they fought,
That democracy might live forever!

America! Can't you hear their bugle call
From the poppy fields, end on end?
Heed their call! Can't you recall?
Haven't they fought your battles?
And battles, too, won for you!
Haven't they earned their bounty,
Each and every one of them?
America! Stand by your boys of the Khaki and Blue!

L'ENVOI

Tho seventeen years since have passed,
Gratitude slow they have won,
Though arm in arm they fought as one!
Lest we forget, have they not served?
Do they not deserve to be served?
America! Stand by your boys of the Khaki and Blue—
Let them know that our flag is still there,
In grateful appreciation for a debt that is fair.

GRADED TAX LAW OF THE CITY OF PITTSBURGH

Mr. MORITZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting two radio addresses by the mayor of Pittsburgh.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORITZ. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address of Hon. William N. McNair, mayor of Pittsburgh, April 5, 1935:

Pennsylvania has a different tax system than any other State in the Union. This is due to our folkway, which was originated by leaders such as Ben Franklin, Henry George, and a long line of students of their philosophy.

Pennsylvania does not have a State income tax, nor does it have a sales tax, and in this respect we think it has an advantage over other States. It also has a flat rate of 2 percent for direct inheritance taxes. The economic idea back of this is the proposition that industry and thrift should not be burdened by the government.

Pittsburgh has taken a step further in that direction by adopting what is known as the "graded tax law." In 1913 the legislature directed the Council of the City of Pittsburgh to reduce the tax rate on improvements 10 percent each 3 years, until 1925, when the rate then would be 50 percent of the rate on location values in the city. The tax rate in Pittsburgh is $10 a thousand on buildings and $20 a thousand on land. The purpose of this law was twofold: First, to encourage the construction of more and better buildings and make it easier for those living in the buildings to keep them; and, second, to discourage the holders of available locations, which were coming on the market for building sites, either for residences or factories or stores, from holding these locations idle and preventing the erection of new buildings.

This plan does not apply to school taxes or county taxes and has not gone far enough to permit me to say that these results have been achieved. We now have bills in the present legislature to extend these laws to school taxes and to make another cut in city taxes, so that the tax rate will be 5 mills on buildings and 25 on land.

Pittsburgh being the only city to try this experiment, I have come to the conclusion that the results have been postponed because of the fact that we are placed in a competitive situation and site owners are capitalizing the advantage which the lower tax on improvements afford.

I also include the following radio address of Hon. William N. McNair, mayor of the city of Pittsburgh, on April 6, 1935:

TAX SYSTEM OF THE CITY OF PITTSBURGH

One advantage which home rule for cities gives in the United States is that wherever a community thinks out a new idea, they do not have to submit it to a higher authority but they can start to experiment. Thus we have thousands of experiment stations in political economy all over the country.

Pittsburgh is one of those stations as far as taxation is concerned. Other cities have tried local income taxes, licenses, sales tax, tax on personal property, but Pittsburgh has kept to the one tax throughout its history, and that is a tax on the location or site value. True, we have a small tax on improvements, but we are gradually trying to get rid of that also. Our present tax on land values in Pittsburgh which are, by the way, assessed at some $600,000,000, amounts to $20 a thousand, and the tax on improvements is $10 a thousand.

This tax on improvements has gradually been reduced by 10 percent every 3 years, so that now a peculiar situation exists in Pittsburgh in that the tax is lower this year than almost any time during the last 20 years, and the school board, which does not apply this graded tax principle, as we call it, taxes the home more than the city taxes, and the county taxes are almost as high for county purposes as our city tax.

Some 10 or 12 years ago New York tried a similar experiment with great success, in that it removed the tax on new homes for a period of 10 years. We feel that eventually we should have the same success in our plan of reducing the rate on all homes.

The philosophy back of this idea is that taxes retard industry, and if you can remove the tax burden from anything like home building or factory building or store building, it will help bring back recovery.

THE ROOSEVELT ADMINISTRATION

Mr. MORITZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORITZ. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call to the attention of the Congressmen that there seems to be a determined and definite effort at the present time to create public sentiment against the Roosevelt administration. This is being done by pamphlets, letters, radio addresses, and in the newspapers. Of course, we have free speech and everyone is entitled to express his or her opinion, but it seems to me that it is time for all Roosevelt rooters to defeat these efforts by calling to the attention of the people of the United States that when the Ship of State was driven aground by circumstances, the Republican administration simply folded their arms and let financial ruin do its utmost, whereas our great President has been successful in getting the Ship of State off the rocks of destruction, even though one of his lieutenants pulled some "dumb tricks", such as killing pigs and plowing cotton under. The people at large must not have sand thrown in their eyes by some subtle politicians.

LAUDS ADMINISTRATION

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks by inserting in the RECORD a short article by Hon. Stewart Appleby, a former Member of this House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Hon. Stewart Appleby, a former Member of this House from New Jersey:

STEWART APPLEBY LAUDS UNITED STATES ADMINISTRATION—FORMER PROMINENT SHORE REPUBLICAN TELLS OF PROGRESS

Former Congressman Stewart Appleby, Republican Member of the House of Representatives from 1925 to 1927, succeeding his father, the late Congressman T. Frank Appleby, of Asbury Park, in a statement to the Monmouth American indicates admiration of President F. D. Roosevelt, comparing him and his achievements with those of former President Hoover.

Mr. Appleby, who has voted in the West since his retirement from New Jersey politics, says:

"We are now entering the third year of the progressive Roosevelt administration, and it is well to take time to reflect what has happened since March 4, 1933, when Hoover stepped down and out and Roosevelt up and in.

"Two years ago banking and commercial failures were our besetting plague. Like the March snow, they have rapidly disappeared, and the bank depositors' money is guaranteed up to several thousand dollars. Commercial failures have stopped. Employment has increased, and confidence has returned under a kind and firm leadership of an able President.

"The right to peacefully petition Congress has been restored. Under the Hoover administration the hardships and deaths that resulted in the war veterans' fracas have disappeared into past history, but not forgotten. The veterans who assembled at Washington and vicinty had a perfect right, under our Constitution, to do so.

"Child labor in sweatshops, mines, and factories has been abolished under the Roosevelt administration. We still have the poor with us and always will, through no fault of theirs. It is far better to have employment wherever possible instead of temporary relief. Employment is based upon ability to buy and sell in the world's markets. Production is being gradually increased, and if the foreign nations ever pay us anything but tokens we will be surprised; but the Roosevelt administration is even making an effort to accomplish the repayment of money after the foreign nations have consumed our goods and used our money.

"STEWART APPLEBY."

SENATE

THURSDAY, APRIL 11, 1935

The Reverend Harry Lee Doll, assistant rector of the Church of the Epiphany, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God, creator of us all, who hast committed unto us the solemn trust of building Thy kingdom in this our generation, Thou knowest that we can do no good thing of ourselves. Sanctify us in Thy truth that we may live worthy of the trust Thou hast given us. Open our eyes that in the issues and events of our time we may see Thy footsteps; that, following in them without haste, without sloth, and without fear, confusion may be put to flight and we may become fellow workers in Thy unfolding purpose. Make us alive to the glory of struggle and adventure. We do not ask that Thou wilt keep us safe, but that Thou wilt keep us loyal. In the name of Him who for our sakes didst face death unafraid, Thy Son, Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

On request of Mr. ROBINSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, April 9, 1935, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

COMPARISON OF BUDGETARY AND FISCAL CONDITIONS

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. President, during our debates on the work-relief joint resolution, I was impressed with the statements of various Senators regarding the present status of our Budget, and particularly by the warnings from some that our recent huge appropriations for emergency projects threaten the very foundation of our Budget system unless we prevent diversions from emergency funds for regular departmental expenditures, and otherwise maintain a sane system of Budget accounting.

I believe that the debates on this measure, and particularly those relating to our financial structure and the necessity for maintaining an efficient Budget and accounting system, were revealing to most of us and were a valuable contribution to the country. To me a number of questions were raised concerning our present Budget policies, which I have attempted to settle in a practical way by comparing the results of our system with those of other countries during the past 15 years or more.

I have realized since beginning this task that there is no absolutely accurate basis for such comparisons, because of the lack of uniformity in systems of Budget accounting and in the forms of political government throughout the world. Yet, certain fundamental problems are related to all budgets, and the League of Nations and numerous writers have attempted to analyze them in great detail, and several books on the subject have been published. From these we can obtain some conception of the results which can be expected if we adhere very long to certain conservative or inflationary trends on the expenditure side, or to various tax policies on the revenue side.

Much has been said recently about our present system of Budget accounting in the United States, and critics have often charged the administration with keeping two sets of books, one of which presents only the regular expenditures of the Government, and the other the emergency expenditures. It has been said that by separating the two the administration is more or less burying a great many expenditures in the so-called "emergency budget", which, in effect, is a deception.

Whatever faults our Budget accounting system may have, I cannot conclude as a result of my comparisons that there is any intention on the part of the present administration to practice a deception in its system of accounting.

In his opening message to this Congress the President frankly pointed to the huge expenditures we had made, and must make in the future, in order to meet the present crisis. Instead of giving the impression of deceiving anyone, he was so open about the matter that he was charged in some quarters with being too pessimistic. There were many who thought that unwarranted fears would result from his very frank discussion of our expenditures. But we have all learned by this time that such candor in talking to the American people is one reason why Franklin D. Roosevelt has the confidence that he maintains today.

To infer that he would encourage or even countenance a deceptive accounting system in the Treasury Department is certainly going beyond the bounds of reason. The comparative analysis reports of receipts and expenditures, which are released regularly by the Treasury clearly divide the general and emergency expenditures, as alleged, but they are brought together in the summary, and the total of both can be found in the same report without difficulty. The division is one for convenience in accounting and reporting, and if any criticism is to be made of this method it must be limited to the accounting procedure itself rather than to the purpose for which the division is made.

We must agree that some importance attaches to the accounting system in the Budget, although, as I will show later, the arithmetic of it is not nearly so important as is the underlying governmental policy which upholds the Budget. So far as accounting systems go, they are as different with governments as are the accounting systems of industry. Some governments keep war financing entirely outside their regular budget reports. Others have certain integral parts which are described as "self-balancing", by which departments, such as the Post Office Department, seek to balance their individual budgets by their own revenues. This is in practice in England. Some countries, such as Australia, use a system of accounting resembling the usual industrial system, by which they write off their expenditures for buildings on a depreciation basis. If they spend $100,000 for a new post office building in any one year they do not count it as a total expenditure for that year, as we do in the United States, but count it off in the budget reports over a period of, say, 20 years, covering the life of the building. Such an accounting system might be satisfactory for certain countries, but whether it would operate in the United States is a question I cannot answer. Finally there are countries, such as Denmark and Sweden, which use the current and capital system, by which current expenditures and those listed on long-term programs are distinctly separated.

Lack of uniformity in budget accounting methods can certainly be expected where there are so many different types of government and finance involved. Even when we are dealing with industry instead of governments we find such a lack of uniformity. The Interstate Commerce Commission, after many years of effort in establishing uniform accounting systems on railroads subject to its regulations, still faces great difficulties in using the figures of various railroads as any basis for comparison. There is always involved the difference in location and other factors which are certain to affect the nature and importance of the financial report of each railroad and make it somewhat different from others.

Criticism for dividing annual governmental budgets into distinct parts has been observed wherever we have political parties jockeying for public favor. The "outs" condemn the "ins" and "view with alarm" the manner in which the Budget is being kept. The "outs" endeavor to show that anything can be done with figures and that it is only necessary to inform the accountants what result is desired and they will arrange to get the result. These charges are as prevalent today as they were 20 years ago when Dr. C. F. Bastable, professor of political economy in the University of Dublin, said:

> Recently the system of special budgets in particular kinds of expenditure has been somewhat widely employed, though it is an expedient calculated to confuse the public accounts and to prevent the true situation of finances being understood. The general rule of meeting expenditure out of income should be openly transgressed only by the use of a loan. A surplus on an ordinary budget, with a deficit on one or more extraordinary ones, is a direct infraction of the principle that the finance accounts should be submitted fully, simply, and in unity.

Certain forms of "emergency" or "extraordinary" expenditures and revenues, separated from the regular expenditures and revenues, have been prevalent in government budgets for decades. It is true that the growth of such "extraordinary" revenue and "emergency" expenditures has been criticized as being too rapid and as opening the way for unfortunate budgetary policy. But so far as the arithmetic or accounting of it is concerned there seems to be no genuine cause for alarm when the total results are submitted "fully, simply, and in unity", as Dr. Bastable recommends. I believe that our Treasury Department reports meet these important requirements.

Of much greater concern to me than the mere technicalities of budget accounting are the problems of budget planning. These problems are not mere arithmetic. National finance is a great policy. Without sound finance no sound government is possible; without sound government no sound finance is possible. In seeking my information I have therefore kept in mind the policies underlying the budget in each country and have found that while these change as political administrations change they adhere more regularly to certain groups, such as that of the parliamentary government budgets, with certain definite objectives to be reached.

Prior to 1921, when the United States adopted a budget system, at least 49 other countries had what they described as the national budget system. The general features of this system common substantially to all of these countries at that time were the preparation of the budget estimates by the executive branch of the government; their revision and consolidation by some central organization in the executive government; the submission of the budget to the legislative branch by the executive upon the authority and responsibility of the executive; the consideration of the budget as a single and unified bill by the legislative branch; the influence of executive responsibility for the demands of the budget, causing the legislature to make few changes; the execution of the budget by the executive, and an independent audit of the executive accounts.

A more accurate discussion of the budget systems in various countries, and policies supporting them, is furnished by A. E. Buck, in his book, "The Budget in Governments of Today", published in 1934. In this work he makes the following general comparisons of systems in several countries and discusses the situation in the United States. I have, of course, greatly abbreviated much of this information:

As applied in different governments of the world, the modern budget may be said to have three essential elements: First, a financial plan; second, a procedure for formulating, authorizing, executing, and controlling this plan; and, third, some governmental agency responsible for each successive step in this procedure. When viewed as a plan, the budget sets forth the monetary requirements of a government for a definite future period—usually a year—and in so doing exhibits a balanced relation between anticipated income and estimated outgo. As a procedure, the budget involves certain definite steps: First, in preparing estimates and framing the financial plan; second, in voting or adopting the plan; third, in carrying out the plan as authorized; and, fourth, in auditing and reviewing the resulting fiscal operations.

The governmental agency responsible for each of these steps is determined more or less by the pattern of government under which the budget operates. In the United States, for example, the Executive should be responsible for the first and third steps, while the Legislature should be responsible for the second and fourth. The Executive, by virtue of his authority over the administration, is in the key position not only to prepare the financial plan, but also to carry it out. The Legislature, according to its historic right, holds the purse strings of the Government. It accomplishes this through authorizing the financial plan presented to it by the Executive, and through establishing accountability on the part of the Executive for carrying out this plan. The latter feature, involving an audit and review of financial operations, is as yet far from being properly developed.

The most essential feature of the budget, as a financial plan, is equilibrium; that is, a balanced relation between revenue and expenditure. Under existing economic conditions unbalanced budgets are among the most baffling problems that governmental authorities have to face. Ordinarily these authorities have attempted to balance their budgets by increasing tax rates, by decreasing expenditures, or by a combination of the two methods. And when they have failed by such methods, as has often happened, they have resorted to borrowing. The policy of contraction—enforced economies in expenditures—has apparently produced balanced budgets in some instances. One of the most successful attempts to apply this policy is embodied in the so-called "Premiers' Plan of Australia", which was carefully worked out on the basis of "equality of sacrifice" and adopted in 1931.

Opposed to the policy of contraction in balancing the budget is the expansionist theory. The latter proposes the use of public credit to increase expenditures for capital improvements and to aid in the planned extension of private production. It is claimed that the effect of applying this theory, once its full force is felt in a country, is to increase revenues and to decrease unemployment relief. Thus the budget is eventually balanced: furthermore, the causes of budgetary disequilibrium are largely removed. The authorities of some governments have apparently accepted this theory at least in part and have provided funds for a program of capital improvements and national development. The United States Government has embarked upon such a program under the new deal.

While many Americans regard the budget, that is, the process of financial planning, as a recent development in government, such is by no means the case. Nearly two centuries ago the budget was fairly well established as an essential part of the mechanism of the British parliamentary system. It was instituted in France more than a century ago. Then it was gradually adopted by other European countries, by Japan, and by the British Dominions. But as late as the beginning of the present century the United States was still without an established budgetary practice in any of its governmental units—national, state, or local. The National Budget and Accounting Act was not passed until 1921. Since that time considerable progress has been made in the development of a National Budget system, although the system is as yet by no means entirely satisfactory. Many improvements are still desirable to lend greater effectiveness to the system and to give it a permanent status in the United States Government. In order to determine the general nature of these improvements it may be well to note briefly the budgetary usage and experience of some of the leading foreign governments.

THE BRITISH BUDGET SYSTEM

This system is applied not only in England but also in the several British Dominions. It is based on certain definite relations existing between the Cabinet or the Executive, on the one hand, and Parliament, mainly the House of Commons, on the other. The Cabinet gets its authority directly from the House of Commons, of which it is, in effect, a great standing committee. But at the same time the Cabinet supplies the leadership for the House of Commons. It accomplishes this through direct contact with the House, where it initiates all important governmental policies, and where its members sit during the session, answering questions or leading the discussions. Thus the Cabinet is made responsible to the House at all times, and its tenure of office depends upon the majority support of that body. When the Cabinet fails to win such support for any of its measures it may either resign as a body or dissolve the House and call an election. If the election returns a favorable majority in the House, the Cabinet remains in office. It is in this constitutional setting that the Cabinet formulates the budget, submits it to the House for approval, and thereupon sees that it is properly executed. As a necessary check on the Executive the House provides for an audit and review of the accounts kept by the administrative departments under the direction of the Cabinet.

According to British practice, the Cabinet is completely responsible for budgetary initiative, and no estimate or proposal can be considered by Parliament without its endorsement. In framing a balanced financial plan the Chancelor of the Exchequer has wide powers of revision over the expenditure estimates, which enable him to control, in a large measure, the requests of the spending ministers. Any unreconciled differences between the demands of these ministers and the allowances of the Chancelor are left to the decision of the Cabinet and the Prime Minister. The Chancelor's main function is to enforce economy on the spending departments. But the Cabinet, as a whole, assumes responsibility for the budget once it has been formulated by the Chancelor and presented to the House of Commons.

In preparing the budget, the Chancellor of the Exchequer is assisted by the staff of the treasury, which is, in reality, under his direction. The financial secretary of the treasury, working as his understudy, takes immediate charge of the expenditure estimates of the civil-service and revenue departments. The Navy and Army estimates are considered separately by the chancelor, since they usually involve broad questions of policy which the Admiralty and the War Office thrash out directly with him. The revenue estimates are prepared for the treasury by the revenue departments, which are directly associated with the treasury.

When the budget is ready to present to the House of Commons, the Chancelor of the Exchequer does so by delivering the "budget speech." Preparatory for this speech, the Speaker leaves the chair, and the House goes into the committee of ways and means, which is a committee of the whole. The chairman of this committee then calls upon the Chancelor, and the House members sit in rapt silence while he proceeds "to open the budget." During this speech, which generally occupies from 2 to 3 hours, and in the discussion which follows it, any member of the House may question the Chancelor. At the conclusion of the speech, some members of the "opposition" usually reply to the Chancelor, often criticizing his budgetary proposals and stating their own views. On the whole, this procedure affords the most perfect staging for the budget which any government has so far devised.

Twenty days are set aside under the British system for discussion of the expenditure estimates by the committee of supply, a committee of the whole House of Commons. These days are scattered through the parliamentary session, usually on successive Thursdays, from February until August. If the Cabinet wishes to, it may allot an additional 3 days to the discussion. The reason for limiting the period of discussion is to prevent the opposition from consuming the entire session on matters of supply, thus preventing the Government from putting through its legislative program. The opposition, through the party whips, generally chooses the votes, or sections of the expenditure estimates, which will be discussed. The committee of supply then considers these votes and adopts resolutions which are reported back to the House as a basis for the appropriations.

Thus the House actually authorizes the proposed expenditures of the budget vote by vote before the appropriation bill—a single bill of only a few pages—is even drawn up. But in order that the votes may be available for expenditure, the amounts must be included in the appropriation bill and passed by Parliament. This is done at the end of the 20 days assigned to discussion of the budget.

Between April 1, when the fiscal year begins, and the passage of the appropriation bill early in August the expenditures of the Government are provided for through so-called "votes on account." During March the financial secretary to the treasury prepares an estimate of the amounts needed to carry on the civil service for the next 4 months. This estimate is authorized by a resolution of the committee of supply passed before March 31. The amounts contained in this resolution are later covered by the grants of the appropriation act.

For the execution of the budget, the British Treasury proper is organized under two main divisions—finance and supply services and establishments—each headed by an officer called a "controller." The controller of finance and supply services deals with all questions relating to departmental estimates and expenditures and all matters coming under the general heading of finance. The departments take up their expenditure problems with him during the fiscal year. He has authority, together with his chief, the Permanent Secretary to the Treasury, to settle all but the larger issues, which may be appealed to the Chancelor of the Exchequer, and on which the Cabinet itself may have to render a final decision. In addition to these duties, he supervises the national debt, the raising and repayment of loans, banking and currency problems, and fiscal relations with the dominions and foreign governments. The controller of establishments deals entirely with personnel, not only of the treasury but of the whole civil service. His consent must be obtained before any department can increase its staff by even one clerk, and all rates of pay are reviewed by him.

While the British Treasury exercises broad supervision, the actual spending of the money is in the hands of each departmental "accounting officer", who is usually the permanent secretary of the department, a civil servant, and the real departmental head. The accounting officer of each department is named by the Prime Minister after consultation with the Permanent Secretary to the Treasury and the political chief of the department concerned. His duties do not relate to actual account keeping, as his title would seem to indicate, but solely to financial responsibility. He is accountable for all payments made by his department and must assure himself of their correctness and propriety. He also assumes responsibility for the work of his accountants and for the departmental appropriation accounts.

Aside from the Treasury and the departmental accounting officers, the comptroller and auditor general, who is responsible to the House of Commons, also has a part, though a very minor one, in carrying out the budget. To make expenditures it is necessary for the treasury to have his concurrence in transferring money from the exchequer account to the paymaster general, whence it is expended under the supervision of the treasury.

But the principal task of the comptroller and auditor general is auditing. His duty is simply to watch, search, inquire, and report; and he is not concerned with keeping general accounts. His work is directed to three phases, namely, verification of treasury and departmental accounts, audit of expenditures and revenues, and a limited examination of the nature of expenditures to determine how wisely money has been spent.

The results of the various audits are embodied in a report which the comptroller and auditor general makes some time after the close of each fiscal year. This report is presented to the public accounts committee and to the House of Commons. Any irregularities detected in the course of the audits which the departments are unable to justify are featured in the report. They are then taken up for questioning and further investigation by the public accounts committee. If the situation appears to demand it, the comptroller and auditor general may go directly to the Speaker of the House of Commons and get any matter laid before that body without waiting until the close of the fiscal year.

The public accounts committee is appointed annually by the House of Commons at the beginning of each parliamentary session. It is composed of 15 members. Its chairman, according to custom, is a member of the "opposition" in the House, often a former financial secretary to the treasury. The financial secretary to the treasury actually in office is also a member. The other members are usually experienced in public finance. The committee meets privately. The comptroller and auditor general sits with it, and so does a high treasury official. The committee usually follows the report of the comptroller and auditor general. The accounting officer of the department whose accounts are being examined appears before the committee to explain or justify the payments which have been made. At the conclusion of the hearings the committee formulates its decisions, with which the treasury is usually in agreement, since both are interested in enforcing regularity and economy in departmental expenditures. As a result, the treasury often puts the committee's recommendations immediately into effect, as it has full authority to do. When the committee concludes its examination, it reports to Parliament.

THE FRENCH BUDGET SYSTEM

Under the parliamentary system of France, the Ministry, although responsible to the Chamber of Deputies, stands on a very different footing from that of the British Cabinet. It never really controls Parliament, since it has practically lost the power of dissolution over the Chamber. This not only reduces its prestige in the Chamber but also results in frequent and useless changes in the Ministry. Under these conditions, the Ministry can rarely hope to have its budgetary proposals accepted by Parliament, as is uniformly the case in England, and there is not the same clear-cut responsibility for budgeting as between the Ministry and Parliament. Then, too, parliamentary checks on the executive find expression more often through interpellation and overthrow of the Ministry than through audit and review of the administrative accounts, as in England.

Under the French budget system, the Ministry is responsible only for the preparation of the initial financial plan. Parliament reserves the right to change this plan in any way it sees fit, or to substitute a new plan. Until recently, the Ministry left the task of preparing the budgetary proposals in the hands of the Minister of Finance. But in 1930 the office of Minister of the Budget was established to supervise this task. According to present practice, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of the Budget share responsibility for the preparation of the budget, thus presenting the somewhat anomalous situation of two chief finance officers.

The budgetary proposals, when submitted to Parliament, are examined by the finance committee of the two houses, which are the most powerful of the several standing committees. These proposals are first brought out on the floor of the Chamber of Deputies by the Finance Committee of that body. The chairman of this committee has complete control of the budget while it is before the Chamber. He is responsible for defending it and for steering the budget bill through the Chamber. When the debate is finished this bill, already passed section by section, is voted in its entirety. It is then sent to the Senate, where a similar procedure is followed. It may be amended in the Senate within certain limits. When there is a disagreement between the Senate and the Chamber over an amended budget bill, it is not easy to settle, since the French do not use the conference committee. Sometimes this bill is shuttled between the houses as many as a half dozen times before an agreement is finally reached.

Frequently this parliamentary procedure delays the passage of the budget bill beyond the opening of the fiscal year. In order to provide money for the operation of the Government until this bill has been passed, so-called "provisional twelfths" are voted. These are expenditure authorizations by months, similar in some respects to the British votes on account.

In carrying out the budget, the Minister of Finance has charge of the collection, custody, and disbursement of all revenues, the Bank of France serving as the depository for the public moneys. His authority, however, is more limited in the matter of expenditures; considerable responsibility rests with the other ministers. Every month the Minister of Finance estimates the moneys in the treasury which are available for expenditure and notifies each minister of the amount for which he may issue payment vouchers during the following month. These vouchers, with the supporting claims, are examined by an agent of the Minister of Finance assigned to each department, called a "controller of incurred expenditures", who ascertains if there are appropriations to cover them, but who has nothing to say about their expediency. Each minister, therefore, controls the payments which are made by his department through his authority to issue vouchers. If the controller of incurred expenditures refuses to give his approval to the vouchers, an appeal may be taken to the Minister of Finance, who gives a final decision. A minister who makes expenditures without the approval of the controller is criminally liable for his action, but the law is not enforced in such cases. Hence financial control, as it now exists, is largely that of an interested minister over himself. However, each minister must keep accounts in his department according to the regulations of the Minister of Finance, who examines the accounting statements before they are submitted to the Cour des Comptes for final verification.

The Cour des Comptes is the principal auditing authority of France. It is a court of accounts, which sits in 3 chambers of 7 members each and has the assistance of a staff of accountants and auditors. The functions of the Cour are confined to the investigation of accounts, conducted entirely through a post audit. The Cour exercises no control over the ministers or their subordinates, and it may not interfere with their work. It merely judges the accounts submitted to it and renders a report thereon to Parliament. Practically all accounts of the National Government, both of receipts and expenditures, come under its scrutiny. It also inspects the accounts of all local authorities.

THE BUDGET IN BELGIUM AND SWEDEN

In setting up its parliamentary government, Belgium largely copied the French system. But in so doing it has overcome some of the faults of this system, mainly due to the fact that it has maintained the Cabinet's power of dissolution over Parliament, the lack of which has so greatly weakened the French Ministry. An unusual feature of this power in Belgium is that it may be applied to either or both houses. This support of the executive's position undoubtedly makes the Belgian parliamentary system operate more like that of England than of France.

The Belgian budget is prepared and presented to Parliament by the Minister of Finance. The procedure for handling the budget in Parliament is quite similar to that of France.

In carrying out the budget the financial methods employed are along French lines, except in the matter of auditing control. The Belgian Cour des Comptes has extended its authority beyond simply auditing the accounts to include a scheme of general approval of expenditure obligations before payment, thus insuring that appropriations may not be overexpended by the administrative departments.

In Sweden the King enjoys independent executive power and he may pursue his own policy in the choice of a Ministry. He has only recently followed the common practice of parliamentary governments in allowing the Ministry to be formed along the party lines of the Riksdag or Parliament and to respond to the political changes in that body. Largely for this reason the Riksdag has not limited its action on the budget merely to discussing and approving the financial plan formulated by the Ministry, as has the British Parliament.

In all matters relating to the Swedish budget the executive—King and Ministry—has the right of initiative, but the Riksdag alone has legislative power. If the two houses of the Riksdag cannot agree on a question of finance, it is decided by a joint vote in which the lower house is always assured of more weight because of its larger membership.

The Riksdag, through its auditors, exercises a certain amount of control over the financial operations of the executive. It may, upon investigation by one of its committee, impeach the members of the Ministry, controlling to this extent the personnel of the executive. In this respect there is a marked difference between the Swedish and British systems of parliamentary government.

THE BUDGET IN GERMANY AND ITALY

Following the World War Germany set up a system of parliamentary government which operated until the advent of the Hitler regime in 1933. Under Hitler the Government has become a dictatorship. The budgetary practices of Germany have been greatly influenced by these recent changes. Modifications of the parliamentary methods as applied to the budget, many of them of a most sweeping nature, have necessarily been made by the dictatorship.

Under the parliamentary government of Germany, prior to 1933, the Cabinet was responsible for the formulation of the budget, the actual work of assembling the estimates being done by the Minister of Finance. The budget was submitted to the Reichstag, which could increase or eliminate items in it, or could make increases or add new items with the consent of the Reichsrat. Such action on the part of the Reichstag was not regarded as a lack of confidence in the Cabinet. The execution of the budget was largely in the hands of the Minister of Finance. At the end of each fiscal year the Minister of Finance was required to submit to Parliament a statement of his accounts which had been audited by the Rechnungshof, or court of audit.

From this general scheme of budgetary procedure the Hitler government has, for the time being, eliminated the part played by Parliament. In fact, the Reichsrat was abolished by decree in 1934 and the authority of the Reichstag was suspended until 1937. As to when and in what form the German Parliament's role will be restored, one cannot predict at this time.

The financial system of Germany is quite different from the French pattern. As organized after the World War, it maintained the German tradition, favoring a powerful executive, and thus resembled the British system, particularly in the matter of budgetary control. Since the Hitler regime, it has become even more centralized. The Minister of Finance is now virtually the head of the financial administration of all Germany, both national and local. He exercises broad powers in the assessment, collection, and apportionment of governmental taxes, in the control of expenditures under the budget, in the issuance of public loans, and in the realization of economic policies.

The Rechnungshof, carried over from the Bismarckian era, is the auditing agency of Germany. It is organized as a court and has a staff of auditors and accountants. Its functions include an audit of all accounts, an examination of administrative efficiency, advice and recommendations to the Ministry, and a final report to the Reichstag. The audit, which is in the nature of a post-audit, embraces the legal and budgetary aspects of expenditures, the levying and collecting of taxes and other revenues, and the verification of all administrative accounts, including those of governmental undertakings. At the request of the Ministry, the Rechnungshof will express an opinion in advance on budgetary and accounting problems, so that the authorities may proceed with the assurance that they will not later come into conflict with its decisions.

Under normal conditions legislative control over the execution of the budget is exercised through a review of the report of the Rechnungshof by the Reichstag. If this body finds the report on the accounts satisfactory, it discharges the Ministry from further responsibility. Such, at least, was the practice prior to the dictatorship.

After having tried parliamentary government for half a century, Italy gave it up in 1922, when Mussolini set up a dictatorship. As in the case of Germany, the Italian dictatorship and the idea of the " corporative state " have largely transformed the earlier budgetary practices.

The Italian dictator is a power unto himself, immediately responsible only to the Fascist Grand Council, if to anyone; he does not require the support of the majority of Parliament to make his proposal effective, and Parliament cannot oust him, or vote a lack of confidence, which is tantamount to his overthrow. The budget is formulated by the Minister of Finance, working at the direction of the dictator. It is then submitted to Parliament for examination and approval, without material changes of any kind.

In the execution of the budget, the dictator is without effective audit or legislative criticism; his financial operations are checked, if at all, by party rather than by governmental machinery. The voluntary militia for national security, operating under the Fascist Grand Council, is rapidly becoming the chief inspecting agency. The importance of the Italian Court of Accounts, a replica of the French Cour des Comptes established during the parliamentary period, has gradually diminished under the dictator. Also the Council of Corporations, created by the Fascist state, now appears destined to supplant one or both houses of the Italian Parliament.

SHOULD WE BALANCE THE BUDGET?

No more fertile field for debate can be found than that surrounding the question of balancing the Budget. It involves not only the question of Budget policy but of a broader concept of governmental activity which might be regarded as purely economic policy. We have, on the one hand, the group which favors a regularly balanced Budget as necessary to maintain national credit. They are usually known as the "contractionists" or "conservatives." On the other, we have a group which believes that the Government should be a balance wheel, serving in times of depression to expend great sums of money for relief and to "prime the pump" for returning prosperity, and which in normal times would finance regular governmental activities and decrease the public debt, while at the same time maintaining the lowest possible tax rate. This group is usually known as the "expansionist group" or "liberals." As shown in the previous discussion of governmental systems, these two groups distinguish themselves throughout the world.

Conservative customs and financial policies will balance a budget, and those with long financial experience, particularly in governmental affairs, point to Great Britain on the conservative side and her success in balancing the budget by economies or "contractions." The expansionists point out, however, that the necessity for a balanced budget varies with the relation between expenditures and national income or national wealth. They say that we have in America a tremendous reservoir of wealth which can be tapped, and a part of which should be used now to start the wheels of industry turning.

In this connection, I have made some investigation, and my best information is that even with our present revenues we have tapped only about 8 percent of our national income as compared with about 21 percent in England. The Britisher begins paying income tax when his income reaches $500 if single, $750 is married. The earned income credit in Great Britain is one-fifth of the net income, with a maximum credit of $1,500. In the United States our earned income credit is 10 percent of the net income, with a maximum credit of $1,400. In this country the corresponding exemptions are $1,000 for single persons and $2,500 for married persons for all classes of income. Take the single case of a bachelor without dependents earning a salary of $5,000 a year. According to careful estimates, he would pay approximately $765 a year income tax under the law as it existed in 1934 in Great Britain, and $685 under the 1935 reduction. In the United States the same bachelor would have paid $140 under the revenue law of 1934. These figures, of course, are based upon the then current rate of exchange and are only approximations.

From the national-wealth standpoint, we find that Great Britain's total revenues represent about 5 percent of the national wealth as compared with a tax approximating 3½ percent of the national wealth of the United States. Because of the impossibility of making anything better than speculative estimates of national wealth, this comparison, however, is of little value. National-income comparisons are more accurate because the tax rates are definitely fixed, and the national incomes can be fairly estimated.

We find the scale of taxes much higher in England in other revenues outside the income tax also. But the point the expansionists make is that budget surpluses and deficits are meaningless unless considered in relation to the total wealth of the country which can be tapped for taxes. France's financial system collapsed primarily because the national income had been drained by taxes, more than because of any particular failure of its system of budget accounting. When we are taxing only a small percent of the national income they say it is obviously less dangerous to throw the Budget out of balance with huge expenditures such as we are making at present, than it would be if we were to keep it unbalanced at a time when we were collecting a much higher tax. The question is, "When have we reached the place when any further taxes, or borrowings to finance our expenditures, will endanger the national credit and invite financial collapse?"

Can it be said that when we are taxing only 8 to 10 percent of our national income we are courting disaster?

I believe most persons would take the view that there is no serious danger in our present status, but that, as various Senators pointed out recently on this floor, we are approaching such a high-water mark in this Congress, with our $4,800,000,000 work-relief appropriation, our situation bears watching. Moreover, it will require that in administering this money and in accounting for it in our Budget financing over the next few years, we must maintain a Budget and a Treasury accounting system which presents an honest picture and leaves no room for suspicion. To accomplish this the Treasury should not hesitate to give statistical information to the public and to the newspapers fully, simply, and in unity, and by the use of accounting methods which will leave no room for inferences. If some criticism is already arising because of certain methods of Budget accounting and diversion of funds from one part of the ledger to another, it stands a chance of being increased as the differences in our national income and taxes become narrower, if such is the result of our present financing.

To friends of the balanced Budget there has seldom been a financial statement on the part of a government which has excited so much interest as the so-called "prosperity" budget of Great Britain, covering the fiscal year from April 1, 1933, to March 31, 1934. Neville Chamberlain, Chancelor of the Exchequer, had a surplus to announce, which is no small achievement in any country these days. The House of Commons received the declaration with loud cheers, but throughout the world there were various reactions to the method by which the so-called "surplus" had been realized. In America and other countries there were criticisms of England's policy in abandoning war-debt settlements, except by making token payments. But generally there was a feeling of appreciation running through editorial comments in this country and abroad, as the following excerpts will show:

Herald Tribune (New York), April 18:

Mr. Chamberlain's budget message is easily the most satisfactory and hopeful since in 1931 a Labor government which had lost the confidence of the world was replaced by a national government determined to put British finances in order and recapture that confidence. There can be little question that it has succeeded in doing so. Not only is British financial prestige higher than it has been in many years, but Great Britain has made much genuine progress along the road to economic recovery.

The same paper in a later issue:

The British achievements are the more solid because they have in them the certainty and permanency which accompany a pay-as-you-go program.

New York Times, April 19:

In a leading article entitled "How the British Do It", the New York Times says "that the budget shows once again how tenaciously the British cling to economic ideas which the Washington of today regards as obsolete. Moreover, it demonstrates that superannuated British methods still produce the goods."

Mr. William Randolph Hearst's New York American, April 20:

Well may Britain rejoice, for it cannot be gainsaid that she has made striking progress along lines of sanity, sobriety, and sound economic and financial principles. She has kept her head when all about her have been losing theirs. As her reward she can now make the truthful claim that she has recovered her primacy as an exporter, practically conquered unemployment, kept the budget balanced, reduced the tax burden, and enlarged her liberality of treatment for unemployed and the aged and infirm. This is a record of great achievement, and what a contrast to the bedlam of our affairs.

Commercial and Financial Chronicle (New York), May 15:

If what is desired is to have industry reassume its own burdens and responsibilities, it ought not to be particularly difficult for the Government at Washington to discern how to go about seeking that end. It ought to take a leaf from the British notebook. Today it is one of the very few countries that can boast a really balanced budget, is probably nearer to stabilized currency than any other, and apparently has been able to show more real progress out of the depths than any important country in the world.

The Goteborgs Handels-och Sjorfarts-Tidning (Sweden), April 18:

He (Mr. Chamberlain) is a cautious general, a typical exponent of that policy which sees in a well-balanced budget the most important condition for a thriving state of trade and a sound national economy. England is thus the only one among the greater powers who has at present got her affairs into such good order as to be able to offer her taxpayers and business world a real alleviation. Behind this success lies no dazzling policy, only a consistent application of sound principles of public finance.

Gazette de Lausanne (Switzerland), April 20:

* * * The British Nation has achieved a remarkable success. The country has made sacrifices and has triumphed over a situation which had been despaired of. The world had begun to doubt her return to prosperity, but she has given a striking proof of her vitality. * * * Mr. Chamberlain has accomplished in two and a half years the task laid before him; he has reestablished his country and once more shown England as an example to the world.

GREAT BRITAIN ALSO BALANCES 1934–35 BUDGET

The results of the British financial policy have again been announced for 1935. The New York Times on Wednesday, March 27, carried the following item predicting that the surplus would approximate 13,360,000 pounds (approximately $62,792,000):

LONDON, March 26.—With just 1 week of the financial year to run, ordinary revenue shows a surplus of 13,359,799 pounds over ordinary expenditure, against 35,493,497 pounds on the corresponding date in 1934. (The pound was quoted yesterday at $4.78.)

However, allowing for the fact that 11,695,360 pounds was used to redeem the debt out of the fixed debt charge of 224,000,000 pounds, whereas the total included in ordinary expenditure was only 211,181,975 for interest and management, there is a surplus as reckoned in the budget of 1,664,439 pounds, against 24,834,008 pounds.

During the past week the income tax has risen above the budget estimate of 219,500,000 pounds, its yield to date being 224,476,000 pounds. As 1934 profits were appreciably larger than those of 1933, the Exchequer will be able to rely on still larger receipts next year.

This makes the second successive depression year in which the British Government has announced a surplus. Since 1920 Great Britain has shown a surplus in 9 years and a deficit in 6 years. The fiscal years ending in 1930 and 1931 both showed deficits as a result of the depression, and in 1932 the revenues and expenditures about evened off, with a very slight margin on the revenue side. Then in 1933 the budget slid back to a deficit, only to rebound in 1934 with a surplus. Whatever criticisms may be showered upon her for the new policies which help balance the budget, such as reduction of war-debt payments to the United States, Great Britain will no doubt receive congratulations again this year as she did when she announced a surplus last year.

The United States had a budget surplus from 1920 until 1931. Since then we have had consistent deficits, due to our huge program of restoration. But, in general, both Great Britain and the United States have maintained an enviable position during the past 15 years as compared with other countries. France, for instance, showed a deficit in 10 of its fiscal years since 1920, and a surplus in 4 years, with a deficit predicted for the present fiscal year. Italy showed a deficit in 8 years and surpluses in 6 successive years, with another deficit predicted this year. Sweden, during the same period, had a surplus in 8 years and deficits in 7 years. Belgium had deficits in 10 fiscal years during the period and surpluses in 4.

No attempt has been made to determine what Germany did prior to the stabilization of her currency, but since 1925 she has been able to show surpluses in only 3 years, with deficits in 7 years.

While statistical comparisons of the trend of the budget revenues and expenditures in various countries are somewhat inaccurate, because of the changing rates of exchange, and the different political factors involved in each government, I have, with the help of the Library of Congress and the European division of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, been able to obtain some very helpful figures showing the trends in these countries which I have just mentioned. In submitting these I wish to conclude my remarks by saying that the time is here when all of us must give more attention to the problems of finance than ever before. Our national credit demands that we proceed on our future legislative course with greatest caution and with greater understanding of national financing than most of us have been able to master in the extremely busy sessions of the past. I think we should carefully consider improvements for our Budget Bureau and our Treasury accounting system, and should welcome proposals which will keep our budget system efficient and free from suspicions or deceptions. But, above all other considerations, we should keep in mind that the sound and safe way to maintain a budget is to have outgo not exceed income.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that certain tables bearing on the subject matter of this discussion may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[2] The German budgets of the inflation period, until November 1923, were estimated in paper marks. With the decline of the value of the currency, constant budget revisions were necessary. The accelerating process of mark depreciation renders useless any attempt to use the budgets of this period for comparative purposes, nor do they give any reliable indication of actual revenues and expenditures during this period. Revenue figures as given above for the years, 1921–24, are as estimated in gold marks.

NOTE.—In making conversions from local currencies into dollars, fluctuations in exchange rates cause increases and declines in the dollar equivalents which have little or no bearing on the actual situation within the various countries, a decline in dollar values coinciding with an increase in local currency, for example. For this reason, conversions at gold par of exchange, disregarding fluctuations in the actual rate, in most cases give a better picture of the situation as it affects the citizens of the country in question. In the attached tables this fact has been taken into consideration and conversions at par of exchange have been included. For the years 1933 and 1934 the old gold rates of exchange have been used as are the use of the lower dollar rates, since the abandonment of the gold standard by the United States would imply marked increase in the budgets of countries remaining on the gold standard.

Persons sufficiently familiar with budget practice in various countries realize the difficulty of getting really reliable figures on comparable bases. This is particularly the case with countries, such as France, which make no final accounting until several years after the close of a fiscal period. The statistics, therefore, however official, must often be considered as merely approximate.

THE PRESIDENT AND SILVER LAWS

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I desire to make a statement with regard to a very eventful occurrence. Last night the President of the United States issued a proclamation directing that silver which is produced in the United States be received at the United States mint at a price of 71.11 cents an ounce. It is not so much the increase in price that is significant; it is the fact that it conclusively proves to everyone who has doubted in the past that the President of the United States intends to carry out the London agreement and the Silver Act of 1934 fully and completely and in the spirit in which that agreement was entered into and the act was passed by the Congress.

Since the London Conference the world price of silver has steadily risen from below 40 cents an ounce until on yesterday afternoon it was 64⅜ cents an ounce. The question was whether the President was going to issue another proclamation to place the price of silver produced in the United States above the world price. He had agreed, as a result of the London Conference, to take from our mines and off the markets of the world the silver produced, and to coin it, and place it in the Treasury of the United States. It was evident that he could not do this unless he kept the American price above the world price, because the producer could sell his silver wherever he saw fit and unless the American price was raised above the world price, American silver would go abroad.

PRESIDENT CARRIES OUT LONDON AGREEMENT

At the time the 1934 silver law was enacted and after negotiations by a number of Senators and other Representatives with the President covering a period of 6 weeks, he assured that group that he intended to carry out the act enthusiastically and in the spirit in which it was enacted. In this body and in other bodies were many economists and statesmen who did not believe the President would do that for this reason: While the first paragraph was mandatory and directed him to purchase silver until he should have purchased sufficient that there might be 25 percent in silver and 75 percent in gold in our monetary reserve—in other words, one-third as much silver as gold—yet by reason of the fact that in the second paragraph it was left to his discretion as to the time, the manner, and the amount that should be bought, there was a doubt in the minds of many as to whether he would not use the discretionary power for the purpose of nullifying the mandatory provision.

I have already shown that the President is carrying out the London agreement. In his first proclamation of 1933, when silver was 44 cents an ounce, he issued a proclamation providing for paying the miners of this country, engaged in the production of silver, 64½ cents an ounce. When the world price of silver reached 64½ cents an ounce, he issued a proclamation offering for United States produced silver 71.7 cents an ounce.

Let us see how he has carried out the Silver Act of 1934. I was at the Treasury Department yesterday morning discussing this matter and I asked for and obtained a report up to March 29. This report discloses that the President has carried out the Silver Act of 1934 enthusiastically and in the spirit in which it was enacted.

The statement I received from the Treasury Department is as follows:

The Silver Purchase Act was approved on June 19, 1934. On that date the total silver bullion stock in the United States Treasury amounted to approximately 62,500,000 ounces and the monetary stock in the form of silver coin in the Treasury and in the hands of the public amounted to $835,900,000. As of March 29, 1935, the total was 457,500,000 ounces of bullion and $855,200,000 of coin. The increase in bullion, aggregating 395,000,000 ounces, consists of the following:

	Ounces
1. Acquired under Silver Purchase Act:
a. By purchase	254,900,000
b. By nationalization	111,900,000
Total (Executive order of Aug. 9, 1934)	366,800,000
2. Acquired under the proclamation of Dec. 21, 1933, covering newly mined domestic silver	24,400,000
3. Melting of subsidiary silver coins for recoinage	3,800,000
Total	395,000,000

The total statutory monetary value ($1.29 per ounce) of both bullion and coins on March 29, 1935, was $1,445,375,000.

OVER 50,000 OUNCES MONTHLY PURCHASED

May I invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that the maximum demand made by any of the so-called "silver bloc" in the United States Senate with regard to such purchases was that the President should purchase at least 50,000,000 ounces of silver each month under the act. The statement of the Treasury to which I have just referred discloses the fact that the President has purchased over 50,000,000 ounces of silver a month since the act went into effect.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will my able friend yield that I may submit an inquiry for information?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I ask the Senator from Nevada if he will inform me if this act of the President in his judgment means encouragement in the increase of silver in our own country, or merely an opportunity for purchasing silver from other countries?

Mr. PITTMAN. The purpose of the 1934 act was to restore to our money reserves silver which in quantity had depreciated from 1900. In 1900 one-half of our monetary stocks of gold and silver was in silver. By reason of the increase in the gold stock, and no accretion to the silver stock, at the time of the passage of the 1934 Silver Act only approximately 11 percent of our gold and silver monetary stocks was in silver. It was to restore that balance, to increase our monetary base, to remonetize silver, and to restore its parity that the Silver Act of 1934 was enacted. Those were the chief purposes of the act.

MONETARY PHASE PRIMARY OBJECT OF CONGRESS

Let me say further to the Senator from Illinois that while Senators from the so-called "silver States"—and there are only six States which produce any quantity of silver—had it in their minds, naturally, that their States would be greatly benefited by an increase in the price of silver, as they have been greatly benefited, because there are today thousands of miners who are working who could not work before the price of silver was increased, yet the benefit which might come to the so-called "silver-producing States" was not their primary purpose. It was not the primary purpose of the President of the United States. It was not the primary purpose of the Senate of the United States. It was not the primary purpose of the Congress, I may say. The primary thought in the minds of the President and the Congress was the monetary phase of silver and not the commodity price paid for it.

There was produced in this country last year only 24,000,000 ounces of silver. If we should double the price of silver it would bring no great income to the United States. There was produced in the whole world in 1934 only 180,000,000 ounces of silver, and seventy-million-and-odd ounces of that was used in industry and did not go into monetary reserves.

This matter has been treated, by me at least, and by a majority of the Senate, as a monetary question and not a commodity question.

THE LONDON SILVER AGREEMENT

Now, let us see where we are. Silver had gone below 25 cents an ounce in 1932 and 1933. The President approved an agreement which his commission negotiated at London. That agreement was intended to eliminate the unnatural supply of silver on the market of the world which was beating down abnormally and unnaturally its price. India was melting its silver coins and flooding the world with silver. It was beating down the price. The world production of silver is small—only 180,000,000 ounces a year. Of course, the supply from melting up the silver coins of India destroyed its commodity value, and therefore its monetary value.

There were 66 governments represented at the London conference, and it was there agreed that there should be prevented in the future the debasement or melting of silver coin. That action instantly destroyed the unnatural supply of silver and restored the supply to the normal supply of mine production.

That supply has been substantially uniform and was a fact published to the world.

They further agreed that they would replace their paper money with silver coin. That was another permanent benefit; but they would not agree to that unless India should be permitted to sell, over a period of 4 years, 365,000,000 ounces of silver derived from the marketing of her coins. They said that was redundant silver and that they had to get rid of it. Nor would India agree to limit to 365,000,000 ounces the amount she was to sell over a period of 4 years unless the governments of the producing countries—namely, the United States, Canada, Mexico, Peru, and Australia—would agree to take an equal amount of silver from their mines and put it in their treasuries so that it might be kept off the markets of the world.

That agreement was consummated, and the President carried it out. He carried it out by the proclamation of 1933, when he agreed to take all the production of the mines of this country at 64½ cents an ounce when silver was selling for only 44 cents an ounce in the rest of the world. He agreed that if other governments did not take their part of the silver off the world markets, he would take it off for them, and he has done it; so that is carried out.

PRESIDENT SUCCESSFULLY HANDLES SILVER LAWS

Mr. President, I wish to say that I know of no more successful handling of any question than the handling of the silver question by the President of the United States. He has acquired probably a fifth of the silver that has to be acquired under the Silver Purchase Act without creating any great reactionary movement, without creating a sudden and destructive rise in the price of silver. There is no question that silver being used as money by many countries of the world, and the exchange value of silver with other countries being measured by the intrinsic value of the silver in the coin, the monetary systems of such countries would be affected by any sudden and violent rise in the price of silver.

Now, mind you, the President had another desire. The chief desire of the President of the United States, as I have stated, was to build up our monetary reserves, to enlarge the base of our monetary reserves, to restore to the Treasury the amount of silver which normally should be there, but also, in an orderly manner, to increase the price of silver until it reached $1.29 an ounce. He is accomplishing that purpose; he has accomplished it splendidly, and his administration of that act so far has resulted in tremendous profit to the Government of the United States and its people.

I say to you frankly that if silver had been instantly forced up to $1.29 an ounce from 44 cents—and it was within the power of the President to do it by bidding for silver—he would not have gotten 50,000,000 ounces of silver a month during the past 6 months, because by bidding for silver as it went up he could have forced it to the price of $1.29 an ounce, and above that price he was not allowed to bid and not allowed to buy. Not only that, but every bit of this silver had to be bought from foreigners. We produce only 24,000,000 ounces a year. That silver was coined under his proclamation. To obtain the billion-odd ounces of silver he had to buy it from foreigners.

Up to the present time the President has purchased 254,900,000 ounces of silver abroad at, I should say, roughly speaking, an average price of 50 cents an ounce. Its monetary value is $1.29 an ounce. That profit to the Treasury of the United States was made from no American citizen, no American industry, but made from the foreigner. Had the President instantly run the price up to $1.29 an ounce, the profit would have gone to the foreigner, and the loss would have been here in the United States.

GRADUAL RISE IN SILVER ADVISABLE

From a selfish standpoint, as a Senator who represents a silver-producing State, I should have been happy to see the price run up to $1.29 an ounce, if it could have been accomplished successfully. It probably would have doubled the prosperity we are now enjoying in mining; but, to speak fairly, to speak as a Senator of the whole United States, to consider the matter from a monetary standpoint, I am compelled to approve the course which the President of the United States took. The price of silver has moved up slowly, very slowly. In 6 months it has risen in world price from 44 cents to 64½ cents. That is not a violent fluctuation. That has not injured China. China today, with the exception of Shanghai, is prosperous. If the price had been suddenly increased to $1.29 an ounce, I admit that it would have disrupted the entire monetary system of China; but that was not done. It is inevitable, however, that this rise in price is going to move on gradually, orderly, until the price of silver throughout the world is $1.29 an ounce, the former parity price of silver with gold. When that point is reached, the President of the United States has the reserve power to maintain it there, because he will not get the silver required at or under $1.29 an ounce. There will always be hanging over an order on his part for silver at the price of $1.29 an ounce. He will have control of it; and when silver shall have been maintained throughout the world for a few months at $1.29 an ounce, the world will realize that it is stabilized permanently at that price, and the mints of the world will be open to the free and unlimited coinage of silver on that ratio, because there will be no longer fear of an over-supply, dumping, and violent fluctuation.

SILVER MEMORANDUM LODGED WITH THE GOVERNMENT

Mr. President, in some respects I am rather disappointed with regard to this last proclamation. On yesterday morning, when I was at the Treasury Department obtaining this information I have just read to the Senate, I lodged a memorandum. I desire to read that memorandum, and then my statement will have been concluded:

The price of silver in the world market today is over 63 cents an ounce.

That was yesterday morning. By yesterday afternoon it was 64½ cents an ounce.

The price has been steadily rising since the approval of the Silver Act of 1934. During the last 2 weeks such rise has been more rapid, although steady and without reaction. There is, in my opinion, substantial reason to justify the belief that this steady and accelerated rise will continue until silver has reached the price of $1.29 an ounce.

This reasoning is based upon natural causes. The President's actions under the Silver Act have been made public by the Treasury Department. The world is now satisfied that the President intends to carry out the mandates of the act to the end that he shall purchase if possible, in an orderly but continuous manner, the amount of silver required under the act to be restored to our metallic monetary reserves.

The world is also now convinced that he intends to carry out the London silver agreement through the withdrawal from the markets of the world of silver produced in the United States for the period stated in the London agreement.

There are also other factors which have influenced, and will continue to influence, the rise in the price of silver. I think it has been demonstrated that there is a lesser amount of floating or speculative silver in the world than was estimated by some economists and monetary experts. The threat of China to abandon the silver standard, while absurd upon its face, was given credence by many high authorities throughout the world. China is now buying silver for its monetary reserves. It may be compelled to nationalize silver as we have nationalized gold. China, however, will remain upon the silver standard. India is also buying silver. Many governments are acquiring silver for currency purposes. The monetary use of silver throughout the world is almost universally recognized as a necessity.

The President has carried out the London agreement and the Silver Act of 1934 in the full spirit intended, and with great success. It was for this reason that both of the Thomas amendments to the work-relief bill were defeated. The report of the Treasury Department disclosed that he has acquired an average of 50,000,000 of ounces of silver per month. The report also shows that he has already caused to be issued silver certificates for a large proportion of such silver.

The rise in the price of silver above 64½ cents an ounce that, under the President's proclamation, is paid for silver produced in the United States is imminent. Emergent action, therefore, is required. Under the London agreement, the President was impelled to take American-produced silver into the Treasury of the United States. The producer is not required to sell to the United States Government. He will sell wherever he can get the largest price for his silver. If the world price of silver is above the domestic price offered under the President's proclamation, he will sell abroad.

When silver was around 44 cents an ounce the President went into partnersip with the American miner to give him half of the bullion he produced in the form of silver dollars and silver certificates, retaining the other half as seigniorage. This was accepted in good spirit by most of the producers as fair treatment. Many, of course, did not understand why the Government should make a profit off of any producers of any commodity in the United States.

Silver at $1.29 an ounce will not be upon the ratio of 16 to 1, as the price of gold has increased approximately 75 percent. In other words, unless the content of the silver dollar is reduced proportionately to the content of the gold dollar, with silver at $1.29 an ounce the ratio would be nearer 28 to 1.

The President has authority under the law, of course, to proportionately reduce the silver content of the dollar. His arbitrary action, based, however, on judgment, in giving the American producer one-half of the bullion, has worked no harm to our monetary system, nor has it adversely affected his administration of the Silver Act of 1934.

I respectfully suggest, therefore, that following the same successful policy, another proclamation be made allotting to the American producer 75 percent of the bullion he produces, retaining 25 percent of the bullion as seigniorage.

This is a memorandum which I lodged with the Government on yesterday morning.

Mr. FLETCHER. The information which is now offered is in harmony with that produced on March 22 and put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, is it not?

Mr. PITTMAN. I have already read it, so I shall not have it printed again. This extends it from February 1 to March 29.

As I have said before, I have always been in favor of the coinage of silver at its natural ratio of 16 to 1. The production of silver throughout the ages has been on the ratio of 16 ounces of silver to 1 ounce of gold, perhaps a little less—indeed, I know it has been a little less—but I did not desire to get into the argument which had been made in 1896 and the years along about that time, when there was so much misunderstanding, but I have said this much because I have never understood why the Government of the United States should make a profit off the silver miner.

THE GOVERNMENT'S LARGE SEIGNIORAGE PROFITS

During the last 40 or 50 years our Government has purchased silver, and it has sold that silver at such an enormous profit to the banks and to business in the form of coin that it has made a profit of over $281,000,000. On the purchase of 389,000,000 ounces of silver under the act of 1934 and the Presidential proclamation, the Government has made a profit, through the difference between 50 cents and $1.29 an ounce; in other words, it has made approximately $300,000,000 in this transaction to date.

It is not impossible to see the President's viewpoint, however. A great majority of the people of our country were imbued with the idea, by reason of the debates in the "Bryan age", that silver was a dishonest money. They had come to the frank, honest conclusion that it was not money. They believed that it was a metal which was probably just as abundant throughout the world as iron, and that if we opened our mints to its coinage, or started to taking the surplus, it would flow into our country like a great flooding stream. Whether they were right or wrong, that was their opinion, and that is still largely the opinion of the majority of the people of this country and a majority of the economists of this country.

Some of us predicted here a year ago, and 2 years ago, and 4 years ago, that there was not over a billion ounces of surplus silver in the world, and that not over a billion ounces could be purchased at $1.29 an ounce. The record of statistics which I have produced here discloses that that is true, and the Government of the United States has purchased only 389,000,000 ounces. The price has increased from 44 cents an ounce to 64½ cents an ounce throughout the entire world.

China is not selling its silver; China is buying silver today. India, which was melting up its silver coins at the rate of about 60,000,000 ounces a year and dumping the silver on the markets of the world at a lower price, even as low as 25 cents an ounce, is now buying that silver back at 64 cents an ounce, because it has dawned upon the statisticians of the world, on the treasury departments of the various governments of the world, that silver is a scarce metal, and that after a while it will be like gold—it will get into the hands of a few.

PRESIDENT'S POSITION REGARDING PRICE OF SILVER

I understand the President's position in the matter. He does not desire to force up the price of silver because he wishes to have the country make a profit in buying off the foreigner. He desires to restore the monetary base, and, having restored it, he desires to stabilize it on a parity, and from that time on to maintain it at parity as a part of our monetary system.

I do not think it is worth while at this time to further argue with him that we should take no seigniorage from the American producer. He feels that as long as the American producer is getting more than the rest of the world is receiving and the program is working he should be satisfied. I do not argue that any longer. That is the President's position in this matter. We compromised with the President and obtained his powerful and necessary support.

I wish to say this, in conclusion, that all of the talk about China going on a gold basis was pure rot. At the time Professor Kemmerer, of Princeton, recommended to the Chinese Government, back in 1930, that they go on the gold standard they paid him for his advice, but laughed at it. They could not get the gold. If they did get the gold, the people would not know what to do with it. For 2,000 years the people of China have dealt in silver, silver coin, and silver bullion. They know what it means. They cannot use anything else.

The statement that we were ruining China was perfectly absurd. The statements coming from the ministry of China now indicate that, with the exception of Shanghai, where there was a "Florida" real-estate boom which broke pretty nearly every bank and banker in Shanghai, China is prosperous.

EFFECT ON CHINA OF RISE IN SILVER PRICES

It was said it was ruining our trade with China. As the price of silver went down, and the exchange value of silver Chinese used as money went down, they could not afford to buy anything except what was absolutely necessary. Their purchases in our country of raw materials increased, while the purchases of manufactured products went down almost to nothing.

What has happened with the uprise of prices? The statistics of the Department of Commerce disclose that our exports of automobiles to China in 1934 were 300 percent larger than they were in 1933, and a similar increase is shown all the way through manufactured articles and semimanufactured articles. China does not depend solely, for the money with which to buy what she imports, upon what she receives from the sale of exports. Like every new country where people are going in with money to buy land and to buy mines and to build railroads, there is an inflow of capital other than from exports. China is an importing country, and will be an importing country until it is thoroughly developed.

The myth is gone, it is dispelled. The predictions are untrue. The statistics with regard to the rise of silver throughout the world, the buying of silver by governments, the buying of silver everywhere, show that silver is a precious metal, that silver is scarce, and that silver must be had for monetary purposes throughout the world.

The various agreements, like the London agreement and our silver acts, have, in my opinion, solved the problem, and in a comparatively brief time the price of silver throughout the world will be stabilized at $1.29 an ounce, and when stabilized at that price the question of silver will be settled forever, because every country will open its mints to the coinage of silver on that basis.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business has not as yet been transacted, and all speeches during the morning hour are made by unanimous consent only.

Mr. NORRIS. A parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. NORRIS. Did the Senate adjourn on Tuesday?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It did.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, the morning business must be transacted first.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; and the morning business has not as yet been completed. The Senator from Navada was speaking by unanimous consent of the Senate.

COLLECTION OF PROCESSING TAXES

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to authorize the President to attach certain possessions of the United States to internal revenue collection districts for the purpose of collecting processing taxes, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

IMPORTS OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS (S. DOC. NO. 46)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the special adviser to the President on foreign trade, submitting, in response to Senate Resolution No. 111—calling for information regarding imports of agricultural products, and cotton and wheat production and consumption—certain data relating to wheat and cotton, which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

MICHAEL ILITZ—VETO MESSAGE (S. DOC. NO. 47)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read and ordered to be printed, as follows:

To the Senate:

I return herewith, without approval, Senate bill no. 488, entitled "An act for the relief of Michael Ilitz."

The bill provides that in the administration of the pension laws or any laws conferring rights, privileges, or benefits upon persons retired from the United States Army, Michael Ilitz, who served as master sergeant, Hospital Corps, shall be held and considered to have been retired as captain, military storekeeper, United States Army, on June 28, 1916.

An identical bill, S. 3499, was disapproved by me on June 27, 1934, with respect to which I stated that—

> In spite of this man's excellent record as a soldier and civil employee, this bill would single him out for special reward. It must, therefore, be disapproved.

The facts presented in substantiation of Senate bill no. 488 are to the same effect as those pertaining to the previous bill, no. 3499. I find no justification for a reversal of my previous action in this case.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 11, 1935.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I move that the veto message, with the accompanying bill, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Iowa, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 14

A resolution memorializing the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States with reference to the program of rehabilitation, to include therein a small farm plan to be financed upon easy terms of payment for actual farmers

Whereas there exists in the United States a condition of unemployment whereby millions of its citizens are without the opportunity to maintain themselves and have thereby become charges on society; and

Whereas vast numbers of these are practical farmers, who, by reason of the exigencies of the times, have been deprived of the land on which they have heretofore supported their families; and

Whereas other vast numbers of our citizens could, if afforded small farms of 40 to 80 acres each, again become self-supporting; and

Whereas, by reason of the depression, land prices have decreased to a point far below normal and intrinsic value, and, through foreclosure, vast quantities of such land had passed into the hands of insurance companies and other corporations to their burden and distress; and

Whereas the Government is spending large sums and, through its agencies, is proposing to spend large sums for the rehabilitation of these citizens in distress; and

Whereas the State of Iowa, with its vast areas of fertile land, affords opportunities for subsistence farming, which would not only relieve unemployment conditions permanently to a large extent, but would likewise in large part solve the problem of overproduction by removing vast areas from competitive production: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Iowa (the House of Representatives of the State of Iowa concurring), That we recommend to the President of the United States and to its Congress that in the program of rehabilitation to be instituted there be included a small-farm plan under which deserving citizens equipped by experience or temperament therefor may be afforded an opportunity to acquire and equip small farms of 40 to 80 acres on easy terms of payment and at low rates of interest, to the end that the unemployment situation may be permanently relieved and that farming lands may again become the property of those desiring to farm and live upon such land, and that the accumulation of farm land by corporations and speculators may be checked; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, to its Secretary of Agriculture, and to each House of Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Vermont, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Whereas Hon. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY, Representative to Congress from Vermont, has introduced a bill in the House of Representatives authorizing the construction of a Veterans' Administration hospital in White River Junction; and

Whereas the need for such a hospital in this State is great: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives, That the General Assembly of the State of Vermont respectfully memorializes the Congress to give favorable consideration to said bill; and further

Resolved, That the secretary of state send an engrossed copy of this resolution to the Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to the Vermont Senators and Representative to Congress in Washington.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Assembly Joint Resolution 7, relative to memorializing the President and Congress to favorably consider and submit to the States an amendment to the Constitution enabling Congress to grant Federal suffrage to residents of the District of Columbia

Whereas the District of Columbia with its half million people is the only community in the United States which is denied representation in the National Government;

Whereas the men and women residing in the District of Columbia have no voice in determining through a vote for President, Vice President, and spokesmen in Congress the policies of the Nation in which they live either in war or in peace;

Whereas the District of Columbia taxpayers must pay what they are assessed without opportunity to determine the nature of their taxes or the purposes for which the money is spent;

Whereas it is a fundamental principle of our Republic that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed: Be it therefore

Resolved by the Assembly and the Senate of California jointly, That the President and the Congress of the United States is hereby respectfully urged to set in motion the machinery for correcting this present un-American condition of the residents of the District of Columbia by submitting to the States for ratification the constitutional amendment enabling Congress to make it possible for residents of the District of Columbia to vote for President, Vice President, and Representatives of Congress; and be it further

Resolved, That the Governor of the State of California is hereby requested to transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Member of the House of Representatives from California in the Congress of the United States, and that such Senators and Members from California are hereby respectfully urged to support such legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

Assembly Joint Resolution 45, relative to memorializing the President and the Congress to enact the required legislation for complete and adequate antiaircraft equipment and personnel as defensive measures for the Pacific coast

Whereas during recent times there has been a great deal of public interest and discussion in regard to the inadequacy of aircraft and personnel defense on the Pacific coast; and

Whereas as a result of such discussion and study on the part of representative organizations of the State of California, and military authorities, it seems clear that there is very apparent weakness in the antiaircraft defense and personnel of the Pacific coast; and

Whereas investigations made and information compiled by Joseph G. McComb Post No. 46, of the American Legion, conclusively demonstrates the inadequacy of the antiaircraft defense on the Pacific coast; and

Whereas California has only one antiaircraft detachment with a complement of 24 officers and 323 men to cover and protect the entire length of the California coast line; and

Whereas at some forts on the Pacific coast there are only 8 fixed antiaircraft guns, and in other instances only 2 such guns; and

Whereas the War Department of the United States has recommended that the minimum number of antiaircraft units, in time of peace, should total 10 complete regiments; and

Whereas antiaircraft equipment and personnel are essential as defense measures for the Pacific coast and form one arm of the military services which cannot possibly be construed as anything but purely defensive in nature: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the President and the Congress of the United States are respectfully urged to enact the legislation required for complete antiaircraft equipment and personnel on the Pacific coast; and be it further

Resolved, That the Governor of the State of California is hereby requested to transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Member of the House of Representatives from California in the Congress of the United States, and that such Senator and Members from California are hereby respectfully urged to support such legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following resolution adopted by the Senate of the State of Texas, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

Gen. George W. Goethals, in commemoration of his signally distinguished services in connection with the construction and operation of the Panama Canal: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Texas, That it hereby commends the high purpose of Senate bill no. 2294, and directs that copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, to the President of the Senate of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD.

Joint resolution for the benefit of the cotton textile industry in New Hampshire

Whereas by the provisions of the National Recovery Act the President of the United States alone is empowered, through his proclamation or by his Executive order, to modify or rescind any provisions of any portion of any code which has been set up for any industry under the act of Congress herein cited; and

Whereas the differentials which exist under the said code, which have grown up under long-continued practice, lay an intolerable burden upon the cotton textile industry of New Hampshire and present an insuperable obstacle to the development and even the continuation of this industry in our State: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives in general court convened, That the President of the United States be requested to exercise the powers which he possesses under the National Recovery Act to the end that the cotton-textile industry throughout the country may proceed under conditions of economic equality and that the readily apparent burdens which are now laid upon the cotton-textile industry in New Hampshire may be removed and that New Hampshire manufacturers and New Hampshire operatives may be assured that no discrimination is practiced against them; and be it further

Resolved, That this resolution be transmitted by the Governor to the President of the United States, with such further representations as His Excellency the Governor may see fit to make, and that the secretary of state be directed to transmit a copy of this resolution, under seal of the State, to our Senators and Representatives in Congress with a request that they act as a unit and with such others as they may induce to join them, to accomplish the results which this resolution seeks to bring about.

Whereas this State has been more progressive than any other State in establishing a reforestation program: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved (if the assembly concur), That the Legislature of the State of New York hereby petitions and requests the President and Congress of the United States to bring it about that the just claims of New York be given consideration in carrying out any Federal program involving the purchase of (marginal and submarginal) farm lands for reforestation, watershed protection, public shooting and fishing, erosion control, public parks, or other conservation purposes; and that these purchases be carried out in such manner that they are in full harmony with the program of conservation in this State.

REPEAL OF COTTON-PROCESSING TAX

Mr. WAGNER presented a resolution adopted by the Utica (N. Y.) Chamber of Commerce, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution adopted by the Utica Chamber of Commerce, April 8, 1935

Whereas the increased cost of manufactured products, due to the cotton-processing tax as imposed by the Federal Government, falls most heavily on those who can least afford to pay—the laboring people of this country; and

Whereas it adds an enormous burden on mill pay rolls that cannot be passed along to the consumer, and that is unjust and indefensible in that it is, in fact, another tax on manufacturers for the privilege of doing business and providing pay rolls: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Utica Chamber of Commerce urges the Congress of the United States to effect the repeal of the cotton-processing tax, and also that copies of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, Secretary of Agriculture Henry A. Wallace, and to United States Senators COPELAND and WAGNER and Representative FRED J. SISSON.

EXTENSION OF NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY ACT

Mr. WAGNER presented resolutions adopted at a meeting of the Coat and Suit Code Authority, New York City, N. Y., which were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved, That the Coat and Suit Code Authority give public expression at this time of its appreciation for the great help which this industry has received through the National Recovery Act in the maintenance of standards of wages and hours, in the elimination of unfair trade practices, injurious alike to the consumer, manufacturer, and retailer, and in the general stabilization of this highly seasonal business. Even the short period in which this act has been in effect has been sufficient to demonstrate convincingly the great value, both present and prospective, reasonably to be obtained from the principle of self-government in industry, which, under this act, this code authority seeks to establish; be it therefore further

Resolved, That this code authority places itself on record as unanimously approving the recommendation of the President of the United States that the National Recovery Act be extended for an additional period of 2 years, and that copies of this resolution be sent to all Members of the House of Representatives and of the Senate of the United States.

BONDS OF PUERTO RICO—MEMORIAL

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I send to the desk a concurrent resolution originating in the Senate of Puerto Rico, and under the rules of the Senate ask that it be appropriately referred and printed in the RECORD immediately following my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, as follows:

I, Enrique Gonzalez Mena, secretary of the Senate of Puerto Rico, do hereby certify that the following concurrent resolution was unanimously approved by the Senate of Puerto Rico on March 14, 1935, and by the House of Representatives on March 26, 1935:

"Concurrent resolution to request of the Congress and of His Excellency the President of the United States, the Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt, that the Organic Act of Puerto Rico be amended so that the bonds issued in the name of the people of Puerto Rico for self-liquidating projects, such as the Guayama and Isabela irrigation systems, and other similar projects, shall not be included in computing the borrowing capacity of the insular government, and for other purposes

"Whereas, by virtue of the provisions of the organic act in force relative to bonds issued in the name of the people of Puerto Rico for self-liquidating projects, such as the Guayama and Isabela irrigation systems, and other similar projects, the borrowing capacity of the insular government has been greatly reduced;

"Whereas, by virtue of such reduction in the said borrowing capacity of the insular government, it is not possible to make the issue of revenue bonds authorized by the act deferring the payment of taxes on real property for a period of 10 years, the proceeds of which, if said issue were possible, would be applied to the restoration of the amortization funds as well as to the relief of the municipalities of Puerto Rico;

"Whereas an increase in the borrowing capacity of the insular government would make possible the aforesaid issue of bonds as well as that of any other bonds which may be authorized in the future by the Legislature of Puerto Rico for the purpose of taking care of undeferrable public services and to give financial aid to the municipalities, which are in a precarious financial condition on account of the damages inflicted on agriculture and industry and on property in general by the hurricanes that have repeatedly swept our island: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate of Puerto Rico (the house of representatives concurring):

"SECTION 1. To request, as it is hereby requested, of His Excellency the President of the United States, the Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt, and of the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States, to enact legislation amending the Organic Act of Puerto Rico to the effect that the bonds issued in the name of the people of Puerto Rico for self-liquidating projects such as the Guayama and Isabela irrigation systems, and other similar projects, shall not be included in computing the borrowing capacity of the insular government, so that the latter may make the issue of revenue bonds authorized by the act of the Legislature of Puerto Rico deferring the payment of taxes on real property for a period of 10 years, the proceeds whereof shall be applied to restore the amortization funds and to the relief of the municipalities, as well as any other bond issue which may be authorized by the Legislature of Puerto Rico.

"SEC. 2. That a certified copy of this concurrent resolution be sent to His Excellency the President of the United States, the Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt, to the President of the Senate and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, to the Chairman of the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions of the Senate of the United States, to the Chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives of the United States, to the Secretary of the Interior, the Honorable Harold L. Ickes, and to the Resident Commissioner of Puerto Rico in Washington, the Honorable Santiago Iglesias."

For transmittal to the Honorable MILLARD E. TYDINGS, Chairman of the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions of the Senate of the United States, I have hereunto set my hand and caused to be affixed the seal of the Senate of Puerto Rico on this 26th day of March 1935.

[SEAL] ENRIQUE GONZALEZ MENA,
Secretary of the Senate.

AMENDMENT OF SILVER PURCHASE ACT

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, on the calendar day, April 4, 1935, I introduced a bill to repeal certain sections of the Silver Purchase Act. On that date I transmitted a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury, and had entered in the RECORD a copy of my letter. Today I am in receipt of a reply from the Secretary of the Treasury, and out of courtesy to him, and as I think is right, I ask leave that the letter of the Secretary in reply to my letter be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY, Washington.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have your letter of April 4, 1935, in which you discuss the advisability of continuing the provisions of sections 6, 7, and 8 of the Silver Purchase Act of 1934. After asking a number of specific questions based upon certain assumptions as to the facts, your letter concludes with a request for my comments upon your thoughts; my correction of any false assumptions; and my suggestions as to any proposed legislation.

I shall begin with the assumptions.

In the first place, the true purpose of the silver program of the Government, as set out in the President's message to the Congress of May 22, 1934, and as embodied in the Silver Purchase Act, is to improve the monetary system of the country, and, immediately and more specifically to increase the proportion of silver in the metallic reserves back of our paper currency. This purpose is explicitly stated in the Presidential message just mentioned and is formally declared in the following language of the Silver Purchase Act of 1934:

"SEC. 2. It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States that the proportion of silver to gold in the monetary stocks of the United States should be increased, with the ultimate objective of having and maintaining one-fourth of the monetary value of such stocks in silver."

Moreover, the statute makes perfectly plain what the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury is with reference to its purpose, and the Congress has left in no doubt how he should proceed in carrying out that purpose, because the act provides:

"* * * the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to purchase silver * * * at such rates, at such times, and upon such terms and conditions as he may deem reasonable and most advantageous to the public interest * * *."

In view of the foregoing, no responsible and just policy could have disregarded the question as to who should reap the advantage flowing from the Government's monetary action with reference to silver. Such was the policy of the legislation which provided that the increased value given to gold by reason of our gold program should revert to the Government for the benefit of all.

At the same time, persons who increase the world's stock of silver as well as gold by mining or refining, may properly be distinguished from people who merely hold or deal in a monetary metal for the purpose of realizing profits from governmental action. Accordingly, people such as the miners and refiners may, on this basis, be accorded a treatment which it would be unfair to accord to the hoarder or to the speculator.

Your first question, whether the authority granted by section 6 of the Silver Purchase Act is not somewhat superfluous when read in the light of the foregoing can lead to only one answer. You ask whether the Congress, in granting such authority to investigate, regulate, or prohibit dealings in silver or the importation or exportation thereof, "did not carry the theory a step too far by selecting one commodity." Have you not overlooked the fact that the Congress has selected two commodities which are subject to such regulation, that those two commodities are the monetary metals underlying our currency system, and that, in the language of the Supreme Court, "there attaches to the ownership of gold and silver those limitations which public policy may require by reason of their quality as legal tender and as a medium of exchange"? To answer your question more specifically, while the international monetary situation continues to be unstable and while we are improving the monetary uses of silver and gold and increasing our stocks of silver, the reserve executive power in section 6 of the Silver Purchase Act, section 3 of the Gold Reserve Act, and section 2 of the Emergency Banking Act should not be disturbed. To do so would paralyze action which the Government may have to take in order to protect our monetary system from possible crises in the international exchange markets and from speculative dealings in the monetary metals and other foreign exchange.

Your next question relates to section 7 of the Silver Purchase Act. You ask if the authority to nationalize silver has not already accomplished the purposes for which it was designed. My thoughts on section 7 are again that the President's authority to call in silver was properly made as broad as his authority to call in gold. By reason of the more stringent regulation of dealings in gold, unnecessary accumulations of that metal in this country are no longer possible. Unless silver were subjected to regulation equally stringent, the authority should remain again to call in silver in the event that a tendency should arise to withhold that metal for nonindustrial purposes. I assume, of course, that you have not overlooked the fact that the order nationalizing silver operated only on silver situated in this country on the date of its promulgation, August 9, 1934.

Your final qustion relates to the so-called "silver tax." You state that you have until recently been "unaware that section 8 levies this tax of 50 percent on silver profits on all transfers and thereby must practically preclude the purchase and sale of this commodity within our jurisdiction." This assumption is not entirely accurate. The tax applies to all transfers but the statute makes adequate provision for abatement or refund of the tax on profits arising from transfers both for industrial purposes and also in hedging transactions in silver foreign exchange. The result is that this tax is payable only where it should be payable, that is, on silver profits arising from an increase in the price of silver due to the purchases which the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to make.

In the administration of the silver tax, the Treasury has succeeded, I believe, in maintaining this distinction. Opposition to the silver tax can come only from a failure to recognize this distinction. Surely it is not unfair to those whose profits are due to governmental action, that half of those profits should revert to their Government. Failure to preserve at least this much would be unfair to the great majority of our citizens who contribute directly and indirectly to the payment of Government expenditures but who do not deal in silver in anticipation of profits due to governmental action.

The remaining half of your letter assumes that the United States cannot buy silver through domestic brokers because of the silver tax. I can assure you there is nothing in this. It is a standard provision of all transfer taxes that when the transferor fails to pay the tax the transferee shall be contingently liable, but that, where the transferee is the United States, this contingent liability does not apply as it would be useless for the Treasury to pay a tax to itself. The silver tax expressly follows this practice. If the United States is not contingently liable as transferee, brokers, acting on behalf of the United States, need not pay on behalf of their principal a tax which the principal does not have to pay. This is equally true whether the agent is a domestic or foreign broker.

The Treasury makes purchases abroad as well as in the United States to carry out the mandate of Congress to purchase silver upon terms most advantageous to the public interest. Congress, in enacting the mandatory silver-purchase program, contemplated purchases in such quantities as necessarily to involve purchases abroad. Indeed the act specifically refers to purchases "at home and abroad." Foreign sellers prefer to offer their silver in their own markets, which, of course, they have every right to do. By doing this, their sales to the United States fall outside the scope of this tax. In making purchases from them, the United States obviously does not evade or connive in the evasion of the tax, either in form or in spirit.

You ask if the repeal of sections 6, 7, and 8 of the Silver Purchase Act would interfere with operations contemplated under the other provisions of this act. I think those three sections have contributed materially to the success of our silver-purchase program and believe that their repeal would jeopardize the true purpose of the legislation of which they form a part.

Very truly yours,

HENRY MORGENTHAU, Jr.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, in connection with this letter I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD an article appearing in the New York Times on April 11, together with an editorial from the Salt Lake Tribune of April 8 bearing on the same subject.

There being no objection, the articles referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of Apr. 11, 1935]

ROOSEVELT RAISES SILVER TO 71 CENTS; WORLD PRICE IS 64—TREASURY CUTS SEIGNIORAGE TO 45 PERCENT FROM 50 PERCENT ON A PROCLAMATION BY THE PRESIDENT—SILVER SENATORS URGENT—DOLLAR VALUE OF GOVERNMENT STOCKS IS $915,613,900, OR FAR SHORT OF 1-TO-3 RATIO

WASHINGTON, April 10.—The Government today raised the price which it will pay for newly-mined silver to 71 cents an ounce from the 64.64-cent rate that has prevailed since December 21, 1933.

The decision was announced tonight by the Treasury, after President Roosevelt had issued a proclamation stating that, beginning today, seigniorage would be 45 percent instead of 50 percent as provided in a proclamation December 21, 1933.

The change, which was forecast by President Roosevelt earlier in the day, indicated that the Government would continue its aggressive policy in the amassing of silver reserves to conform to the act of Congress which held that the ratio of silver to gold in our monetary reserves should be 1 to 3.

Secretary Morganthau, after a conference with the President, issued a statement outlining the new policy. The fact that the world price of silver, gradually rising since the United States started its purchases late in 1933, had reached about 64⅛ cents today, was believed to have caused the decision.

PRICE HAS RISEN FROM 42 CENTS

When the 64½-cent price for newly mined silver was fixed by proclamation, the world price was slightly more than 42 cents. It crept up steadily as the United States bought in the world markets, New York, London, Mexico, and other centers.

In official circles, the increase in the price was interpreted as meaning that the United States had set out upon even a more vigorous policy than was indicated by the fixing of the 64½-cent price late in 1933.

The immediate effect, in the view of many experts, was a probable continuation in the increase in the world price for silver, to the profit of those countries on the silver or partially silver standard of monetary reserve, and likewise to the profit of the silver producers in the United States.

Some observers professed to believe that the administration's action was at least partly induced by influence from the silver States.

The "silver Senators" have for many months conducted an intensive campaign in the direction of higher prices for the metal. After the original fixing of a price far above the world market level, and with the subsequent gain in the world price, the Senators pressed for another increase.

CONSTANTLY WATCHED WORLD PRICE

Senators WHEELER, of Montana, COSTIGAN, of Colorado, and MCCARRAN, of Nevada, Democrats, were especially urgent in attempting to influence the administration to keep the silver price paid by the Government ahead of that for which it might be sold in the world market.

The President, under the law, may raise the price of silver by proclamation to $1.29 an ounce.

Until today 50 percent seigniorage was deducted from the price of $1.29 an ounce. Thus when an ounce of silver was turned over to the Treasury only half of its value would be returned to the seller. That resulted in a 50-percent profit, or seigniorage, to the Government.

With the new policy calling for seigniorage of 45 percent, there will be an increase in the price to 71.1111 cents an ounce.

From the date of the Presidential proclamation of December 21, 1933, to April 8 the Treasury bought about 32,611,000 ounces of silver at 64½ cents an ounce. This represented a payment of about $21,000,000.

NINE HUNDRED AND FIFTEEN MILLION SIX HNUDRED AND THIRTEEN THOUSAND NINE HUNDRED DOLLARS IN THE TREASURY

Under the nationalization order of August 9, 1934, about 112,594,155 ounces of silver were bought at 50 cents an ounce, or around $56,000,000. The nationalization order provided for the taking over of existing stocks.

On April 8 the dollar value of silver as carried on the Treasury books was about $915,613,900.

While the silver stocks, as shown by Treasury figures, were 155,205,000 ounces, including that newly mined and obtained under the nationalization order, it was believed that a much greater amount than that had been obtained through the operation of the Treasury's $2,000,000,000 stabilization fund alone.

Some authorities thought that the Treasury might meet the rising world price by tapering off its purchases of silver to prevent a possible collapse of the silver market should prices go above a reasonable level. To these experts tonight's action by the Treasury was a distinct surprise.

THE TREASURY'S STATEMENT

The Treasury announced the action on silver in the following statement, including the President's proclamation:

"The President issued a proclamation amending his proclamation of December 21, 1933, with respect to coinage of silver so as to provide that the seigniorage on newly mined domestic silver presented to the mints for coinage shall be 45 percent instead of 50 percent, as provided in the proclamation of December 21, 1933. The new rate of seigniorage will be applied to all silver mined on and after today, Wednesday, April 10, 1935.

"The effect of the proclamation will be to increase the net amount returned for newly mined domestic silver from approximately 64.6 cents per fine ounce to approximately 71 cents per fine ounce."

"'By the President of the United States of America:

"'A PROCLAMATION

"'Whereas by proclamation of the twenty-first day of December 1933, as modified by proclamation of the ninth day of August 1934, the United States coinage mints are directed to receive for coinage and addition to the monetary stocks of the United States silver mined subsequent to December 21, 1933, from natural deposits in the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof; and

"'Whereas such proclamation, as so modified, is subject to revocation or further modification as the interest of the United States may seem to require;

"'Now, therefore, finding that the interests of the United States require further modification of said proclamation of the twenty-first day of December 1933; by virtue of the power in me vested by the act of Congress cited in said proclamation, and other legislation designated for national recovery, and by virtue of all other authority in me vested;

"'I, FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT, President of the United States of America, do proclaim and direct that with respect to all silver received by a United States coinage mint under the provisions of the proclamation of the 21st day of December 1933, which such mint, subject to regulations prescribed hereunder by the Secretary of the Treasury, is satisfied has been mined on or after April 10, 1935, from natural deposits in the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, the deduction for seigniorage and services performed by the Government shall be 45 percent and there shall be returned therefor in standard silver dollars, silver certificates, or any other coin or currency of the United States, the monetary value of the Silver so received (that is, $1.2929+ a fine ounce), less such deduction of 45 percent.

"'Notice is hereby given that I reserve the right by virtue of the authority vested in me to revoke or modify this proclamation as the interest of the United States may seem to require.'"

[From the Salt Lake Tribune of Apr. 8, 1935]

SILVER ACT REVISION

Silver comes to the fore again as a national consideration, with Senator MCCARRAN, of Nevada, proposing material revision of the Silver Purchase Act enacted at the last session of Congress. The Nevada solon would strike three sections from the act, as now written, in the hope that it would improve the Government's position with regard to the white metal and establish an American silver market.

The sections of the law which Senator MCCARRAN would repeal permit the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, to investigate, regulate, or prohibit all trading in silver, enable the Government to impose a 50-percent levy upon all silver profits, and authorize the President to nationalize silver. In a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury, Senator MCCARRAN points out that these particular sections never were satisfactory to the silver-producing sections and were concessions to the Secretary's demands.

Senator MCCARRAN pertinently contends that the existing law has driven the silver market from the United States to Montreal and London. He argues further that it puts a penalty upon American citizenship, which, he believes, is to be removed only by the reestablishment of a free market. The silver-producing sections of the United States will agree with the main arguments of the Nevada solon on the experience of the past year.

Notwithstanding the fact that the silver legislation of the last session was in response to insistent demands for the remonetization of silver, it fell far short of the program which the silver advocates had in mind. Nationalization of the white metal at once defeated the major aims of this program, so far as its advocates had expected it to reflect itself in commodity price levels.

The penalty on silver profits, likewise, became a discouraging factor for the silver producer. As a result, our silver program has suffered disappointments similar to other defeats in the national recovery program. Because of that, the proposals of Senator MCCARRAN should find consistent and growing support, particularly in those ranks where the urge for rejuvenation of the private effort is being stressed.

Denationalization of silver and the elimination of undue penalties in the marketing of silver would be a step in this general direction. It would tend to recreate the incentive to private initiative and effort, for which the Government has been unable to find a substitute in public enterprise. Never before has a nation expended its funds more lavishly and never has the result of the spending been more fleeting or uncertain.

Our economic difficulties still are entrenched in our monetary system. Such changes as have been made have been designed to protect the governmental position, and the private effort has been left more or less bewildered and inactive.

Fundamentally we still are the richest nation in the world. We produce abundantly, so profusely that we have had governmental resort to restrictive processes and destructive practices. In the face of all this we are stagnant, with millions on relief and private initiative dormant, awaiting the next move of the Government. Until we have restored private incentive and initiative we are all wards of a beneficent government. Until the distributive processes of our national wealth are set to work, this restoration is bound to be slow and difficult, if not impossible.

The changes proposed by Senator MCCARRAN are significant of this and designed to realine the private effort with the governmental need. A free silver market, undoubtedly, would help. At least it would point the way to a medium of exchange in which title would be absolute. In this, no doubt, is the elasticity and the fancied security of the metallic bases of our currencies. The McCarran proposals, at least, point to a basic ill and possibly suggest a remedy worth trying.

THE 6-HOUR DAY

Mr. BLACK. I send to the desk and ask unanimous consent to have read an editorial from the Washington Herald dated October 19, 1931. I make this request by reason of an editorial which appears in the same newspaper today entitled "A Quack Remedy", which makes certain statements with reference to all people who believe in a 6-hour day. I desire to have read at the desk the editorial from the same newspaper dated October 19, 1931, which is slightly different from the statement made in the editorial of today referring to the so-called "misguided political efforts" of the proponents of legislation to provide a 6-hour day. The editorial in today's Washington Herald also refers to the legislation for a 6-hour day in the following language:

It would muddle-headedly seek to cure the paradox of poverty amidst plenty by abolishing plenty.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

[From the Washington Herald of Oct. 19, 1931]

SIX-HOUR DAY EVENTUALLY, WHY NOT NOW?

The time has come for American employers and labor leaders to come to grips with the fundamental facts concerning unemployment.

Leaders must be reminded that business exists for the service of men. The ironic maladjustment in industry, with glutted markets on the one hand and undernourished people on the other, constitutes a serious indictment of management in the large.

Business has been depressed because executives were slow to discard outmoded ideas.

In order to sustain prosperity through maintaining an adequate home-consuming market, business must share with workingmen more liberally the fruits of the improved industrial efficiency, resulting from greater use of labor-saving machinery and from improved technique of operations. Failure to do so precipitated the present crisis.

In emphasizing that the time was at hand for another reduction in the hours of labor, William Randolph Hearst yesterday pointed out:

"Labor-saving machinery makes a reduction of hours possible and, in fact, necessary. Otherwise vast numbers of working people will be thrown out of employment.

"It has been the habit of the employing classes to take the full benefit of labor-saving machinery and capitalize it, depriving the working people of their due share of the benefit.

"The advantage of labor-saving machinery should be distributed to the employers in greater profits, to be sure, and to the consumer in cheaper prices; but, above all, to the working people in shorter hours, better wages, and better living conditions."

With the demand and supply of man power out of balance, American industry should immediately consider ways and means of adjusting itself to the 6-hour day.

Routine minds will find many reasons why the proposal will not work. The same negative reaction followed the campaign for an 8-hour day instead of a 10- or 12-hour day.

But in spite of reactionary rhetoric, the inexorable force of economic pressure is already compelling large-scale industrial experiments in spreading jobs among wider groups of men.

A leading industrial statistician estimates that general adoption of the 6-hour day would increase the present number of wage earners in industry alone by at least 2,000,000 persons.

Under the aegis of the Manufacturing Chemists' Association, leading corporations in the chemical industry have recently inaugurated the 6-hour day in order to spread available work among the greatest number of workers.

The president of one of the leading corporations in that industry, in a statement to the Hearst newspapers, declared: "While the immediate cause of our adopting the plan was emergency relief, it may well be that it will become a permanent policy."

Thus, creative leaders use an acute crisis as an opportunity for building sounder and more humane economic policies.

A leading American cereal manufacturer, who pioneered with the 6-hour day, has reported that the productivity per worker has increased 3 percent to 4 percent.

The Hearst newspapers accordingly urge enlightened employers and representatives of trade-unions to confer immediately to discuss conditions under which the 6-hour day in industry may be promptly ushered in.

The proposal is especially timely for public utilities, railroads, foodstuff trades, and other relatively stable industries which are still operating on reasonably full schedules, despite the depression.

Under conditions of prosperity a 6-hour day will enable the worker to enjoy longer leisure and to develop along cultural lines.

Mr. BLACK. I do not desire to ask that the other editorial to which I referred be placed in the RECORD. If Senators are interested in it, I have it on my desk. I also have other editorials from the Washington Herald which strongly favor the 6-hour day, including one by Mr. William Randolph Hearst.

MILITARY AND NAVAL NEEDS—ADDRESS BY SENATOR SHEPPARD

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the able Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. SHEPPARD] in a very commanding address before the Military Order of the World War at the Army Day banquet, Washington, D. C., April 6, 1935, set forth the defense and justification of the military bill and an increase of our Army. I take the liberty to request that the address be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is my purpose to demonstrate tonight the need of an adequate Army and Navy to assure the economic survival of the United States.

In order to maintain the economic well-being, the independence, and the progress of the United States, it is necessary that we continue to draw on foreign sources for a number of essential raw materials, and that we be accorded access on just and proper terms to the markets of the world for inevitable surpluses. We use about one-half of the important raw materials of the entire world. Of some of the most essential of these we do not have an adequate domestic production. In order to secure a steady supply of the articles necessary to our present standards of existence and to our further progress, we must be able to send abroad commodities of our own production to be exchanged for such articles. The lines of transport on sea and land in every part of the globe along which these articles must be conveyed are as much our lines of defense as our land borders. These lines must be kept unbroken and intact if the present status of our civilization, that colossal agricultural, industrial, and financial set-up that has produced for the American people more of the necessities and facilities of modern life than any other people have ever known is, to be preserved, if disintegration, chaos, and subsequent alternatives of barbarism or despotism are to be prevented. It is necessary, therefore, that there shall prevail a definite understanding throughout the earth that any attack upon the processes and sources of the existence of this Republic will find us prepared to sustain our rights. Nothing will contribute more effectively to such an understanding and to world peace than the maintenance by the United States of an adequate military and naval defense.

A brief survey of modern conditions will show that such a defense is not only the most practical assurance against war at present and for many years to come, but that by reason of its function as a preventive of war it is also a fundamental guaranty of our own internal welfare. So long as there is no proper preparation against war, no law we may enact, no step we may take, for development within our own borders may be regarded as safe or permanent. All our efforts within our own boundaries for mutual good, for individual freedom and prosperity, for a more equitable distribution of wealth, for individual ownership of home and means of livelihood, for American standards of existence and progress, may be dissipated and destroyed by our engulfment in the flaming furnaces of war. The principles and institutions of peace are always subordinated to the exigencies of conflict, while losses, panics, dislocations plague mankind for decades following its close. Witness the experiences of this country and the other nations since the last World War. An adequate national defense is one of the principal protections of prosperity and security and of the final beneficiary of that prosperity and security—the American home. In shielding us from war, an effective defense policy also guards us from physical calamities and agonies beyond description. I hardly need to remind you that recent inventions and discoveries in the laboratories and studios of science have developed guns and gases and explosives of such destructiveness that in the event of another struggle they will make the horrors of the last war seem insignificant in comparison.

At this point, let us proceed to a more detailed analysis of the situation I have outlined in reference to the dependence of our country on outside sources and the necessity of a sufficient military and naval force to assure access to such sources. It is true that in the production of the articles, implements, and facilities of current civilization, we far surpass every other realm. Indeed the boast is often made that we are able to live unto ourselves alone without the necessity of looking abroad for indispensable materials of industry and economic life. In truth, however, we are so utterly dependent on lands beyond the seas for so many of these materials that without them our industry and progress would cease on anything like the present scale. Without them disturbances, suffering, crises—social, political, and financial—might seriously imperil that system of free and progressive government which is now the wonder of the time. Consider steel. Is it possible to imagine what we know as American civilization without steel—steel, the basis of the railway, the factory, the production of modern agricultural implements, the giant structures of business, education, art, benevolence, finance? Is it possible to envisage the disastrous results of any interruption in the production of steel in the United States—steel, the very foundation of our supremacy in world industry? And yet, some idea of the dependence of the fabrication of American steel on other countries may be obtained when we recall that not a pound of steel can be made without ferromanganese, and that more than 90 percent of the ferromanganese used in the United States in making steel must be secured from foreign lands—from Russia, India, the gold coast of Africa, and Brazil. Observe the case of rubber. The mere mention of this article arouses an immediate vision of its fundamental place in our industrial processes and in our everyday life. For practically our entire supply of rubber we must look to the remote reaches of the earth—to Ceylon, the Dutch East Indies, the Malay States, Brazil. We use 70 percent of all the rubber produced in the world but produce almost none ourselves, not more than 1 or 2 percent of our requirements. Of tin, the article on which we universally rely for the preservation and shipment of food on a scale making possible a constant supply for our people, we produce none, but must look for a sufficient quantity to meet our needs to the distant regions of the Straits Settlements and Bolivia.

Half our raw wool comes from distant lands—Argentina, Uruguay, Australia, South Africa, Canada, and certain European countries. Without these foreign sources of supply there would be a dangerous shortage in the United States of wool, that article so necessary to the health and strength of vast numbers of our people. A number of indispensable medical materials must be obtained from the other side of the oceans that beat upon our shores. Let it also be remembered that 50 to 60 percent of our cotton, much of our wheat, tobacco, mineral production, and machinery must be sold abroad if we are to obtain in return the essential commodities we do not adequately produce, if millions of occupations, thousands of plants, and multitudes of investments in this country are to be saved from destruction, our country from economic and financial ruin.

Our position is typical of that of the rest of the world. Virtually all the leading nations must look to foreign regions for many of the necessary materials of industry and life and for the necessary exchange of surpluses. This means that lines of defense which the principal nations, including our own, must maintain, or must be prepared to maintain, in connection with lines of import and export essential to modern existence and development, cross and recross in every part of the world on sea as well as land.

This means that the world is always faced by the danger that the struggles for raw materials and markets, too often characterized by aggressions, exactions, deceptions, retaliations, by distrustful and suspicious bargainings, will become sources of international friction and hostility, increasing provocations of war. Under existing world conditions, war between two or three nations anywhere on the globe may bring to any other nation whose vital transport and trade connections with the outside are suspended, disasters beyond control or calculation, and thus force other nations having no part whatever in the original outbreak of hostilities into the conflict, together with the rest of the world. Under such circumstances the nation without adequate means of preserving and defending its sources of supply will lose its power to maintain for its people decent standards of existence, its power to preserve them from ultimate economic degradation, its power to retain its own independent identity. The possession of that power is the surest safeguard of a nation against war. The possession of such power by the United States is the surest safeguard of the world against war. In making adequate preparation for the defense of its own far-flung lines of supply and of surplus disposal, the United States will establish orderly world conditions, because the entire world is traversed by our lines of import and export. In a protective and defensive system adapted to such an objective lies the chief hope of the peace, the security, and the happiness of mankind. And no other element in our population may be more genuinely relied upon to do its part in connection with such a system than the American soldier, whose path has been a path of service and whose march has been a march of glory from Lexington to Chateau Thierry, from Yorktown to the Argonne.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF THE N. R. A.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an editorial from the Kansas City Star entitled "Why Not a Court Test of the N. R. A.?" and also one from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch dealing with the constitutionality of the N. R. A.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Kansas City (Mo.) Star of Apr. 4, 1935]

WHY NOT A COURT TEST OF THE N. R. A.?

Several Members of the Senate, both Democrats and Republicans, and including the Senate Finance Committee, are calling for a Supreme Court decision on the legality of the Recovery Act before there is further legislative effort to extend it for another 2 years. The position of these Senators seems reasonable. It was taken after the Department of Justice virtually had ceased defense of the act as challenged in the Belcher lumber case, in which a Federal court already had given an opinion adverse to the N. R. A.

A resolution sponsored by Senator CLARK, of Missouri, Democrat, and Senator HASTINGS, Delaware, Republican, is said to have considerable support in the Senate. It states that a Supreme Court decision on the issues raised in the Belcher case "would be of great assistance to the Senate in determining what changes are necessary, or whether a constitutional act should be passed to accomplish the purposes desired."

Why should there be reluctance to submit the act to a high court test, when the attempt is being made to have it extended? Some of the Senators have charged the N. R. A. with bad faith in the matter. At least, there is an evident lack of faith in vital parts of the Recovery Act as it stands. It is evident that in the revised act proposed to Congress there is an effort to avoid such doubtfully legal provisions as are carried in the existing statute. Senator HASTINGS makes the additional charge of an N. R. A. hope to gain time by the extension, to postpone a final show-down in Court until industry became so entangled in N. R. A. regulations that it could be argued an unfavorable decision would create immense and hurtful confusion.

However that may be, the request of the Senators for helpfully clarifying action by the Justice Department and the N. R. A. itself should be answered with something more than silence. That attitude provokes too much curiosity as to what may be behind it.

[From St. Louis (Mo.) Post-Dispatch of Apr. 3, 1935]

THE BELCHER CASE

By its action in the Belcher lumber case, the Government has deferred indefinitely a Supreme Court interpretation of moot phases of the National Industrial Recovery Act. It has exposed itself to the charge of being unwilling to face the issue on the grave constitutional questions involved. It has deprived Congress, which is now being asked to extend the act for another 2 years, of the guidance of a Supreme Court decision.

William E. Belcher, Alabama lumber-mill owner, was charged with violating the wage and hour provisions of the lumber code. His attorneys argued the unconstitutionality of the N. R. A. and were sustained by Federal District Judge Grubb, who held that N. R. A. violated the commerce clause of the Constitution; that it constituted an unlawful delegation of power by Congress; and that it violated constitutional guaranties of right to speedy trial and against infliction of unusual punishment.

Despite the fact that 22 N. R. A. cases are on their way through the courts, the Belcher case was the only one that had reached the Supreme Court stage. It was set for argument April 8. On March 26 the Department of Justice announced it would ask for dismissal of its own appeal. This decision was reached after a 3-hour conference between Attorney General Cummings and Solicitor General Reed.

Their stated reason for this unusual action is that the lumber code "contains administrative provisions peculiar to itself with respect to the extension of discretionary powers to nongovernmental agencies—a fact which was emphasized many times in the recent Senate committee hearings and which sets this code in a class by itself." It was pointed out that other cases not possessing this peculiarity are being pressed for early decision.

The explanation is neither wholly clear nor wholly convincing. If the Belcher case was a peculiar one, it would seem that the Department of Justice might have discovered the fact prior to the eleventh hour. Indeed, under the Department's view, the case should never have been appealed from Judge Grubb's decision. On the other hand, if it be true that the Belcher case possesses characteristics not applicable to other N. R. A. cases, the Supreme Court might have been depended upon to recognize its peculiarity and decide it accordingly.

Regardless of the merit of the Department's explanation, the dismissal of the appeal has created the impression that the Government lacks confidence in the ability of N. R. A. to withstand a Supreme Court test. It has given HUEY LONG the opportunity of telling, in racy language, how the Government "ducked" the issue. It has created confusion in the lumber business, whose code authority has asked for suspension of the code on the ground that the Government has incapacitated the agreement by withdrawing the Belcher appeal.

Further mystification is added by a statement of Donald Richberg, N. R. A. chairman, in which he specifically dissociates himself from the Department of Justice's action. Says Mr. Richberg: "I would like to make it clear that the decision (to withdraw the Belcher case) was made by the Department of Justice. I am not expressing any disagreement with the Department of Justice, but I don't want it understood that withdrawal is made because of pressure by N. R. A."

In fairness to the country, the Department of Justice should have proceeded with the Belcher case.

GOVERNMENT HOUSING CORPORATION—ADDRESS BY H. W. LAIDLER

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a radio address by Dr. Harry W. Laidler, executive director of the League for Industrial Democracy, delivered at the Cosmos Club, Washington, D. C., on Saturday, March 30, 1935, on the subject A Government Housing Corporation.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

During the war building had been practically suspended. The housing situation, bad before the war, had become well-nigh intolerable.

The people of the nations waited for some time for private speculative building to supply the needs for the average wayfaring man. They waited in vain.

From those days until today public authorities have put up around a million houses for the workers of England, Scotland, and Wales, some in the form of apartments, some detached homes in

England's famous garden cities. Nearly one-third of the acres of England and Wales are covered by planning schemes or resolutions. The British Labor Party has just adopted a housing program with such objectives as:

"1. A self-contained house for every family of two or more persons, at a rent it can afford to pay.

"2. The abolition of overcrowding.

"3. The elimination of the slums and of every unfit house.

"4. The thorough repair of every house that can be made fit.

"5. And the large-scale replanning of built-up areas, with proper provision for open spaces."

The housing plank of the party calls for two and one-fourth million new houses immediately, and states that between five and six million new houses may be needed during the next decade or two.

This plan of the Labor Party leaves it to Parliament to lay down the general lines of housing policy and finance, but would have the Minister of Health responsible for the size and speed of the program and give him "concurrent powers to undertake local programs where local authorities are unable or unwilling to undertake a housing program."

In constructing 60,000 working-class apartments, Vienna followed certain rules. It required that not more than 50 percent of the land be occupied by an apartment house. The remainder should be given over to courts and to open spaces.

The buildings should be fireproof and the walls soundproof. Every window should be open to the sunlight.

The apartment houses should, furthermore, be equipped with up-to-date electrical machinery for washing and ironing, with central baths, with nurseries, with auditoriums for meeting purposes, with cooperatives and other community services.

Holland has rehoused one-fifth of her population with public assistance since 1915, chiefly since 1920. Swiss cities such as Zurich have done much. The suburbs of Paris contain many a municipal apartment house. Nearly all other European countries have assisted in some way in the building of working-class homes. It has, indeed, even been estimated that some 7,000,000 dwellings have been erected in Europe with public assistance since 1918.

During the world conflict, a housing division of the Shipping Board and a United States Housing Corporation were organized, and the Government appropriated $175,000,000 for these agencies.

But for the most part America, prior to the depression, was one of the few industrialized countries which considered it no concern of the community that a third of its families lived in homes that lowered their resistance to disease. We left the building of homes to private promoters, and during the boom days of 1922 to 1929, speculative builders put up thousands and thousands of apartments.

In the meanwhile, even during days of so-called "unparalleled prosperity", housing conditions for masses of our people were tragic. Nearly 1,700,000 people in the city of New York continued to live in old law tenements built between 1860 and 1900, most of them unimproved, ugly, congested, breeders of disease and crime. Mrs. Edith Elmer Wood, an American authority on housing, maintains that one-third of the houses in the country in this period of the new capitalism were so below modern standards that they ought to be demolished.

Housing conditions have become worse during the depression. Residential building has again been virtually suspended. Although normal national housing needs requires the building of from 400,000 to 600,000 new homes a year, since 1931 the construction of new dwellings has hardly exceeded 50,000 a year.

In 1933, the volume of residential building was, in fact, less than one-tenth of the 1926 volume.

On the setting up of the P. W. A. in 1933, $150,000,000 was appropriated for public projects. Speculative builders and realtors in many parts of the country did much to delay building programs. Thirteen Federal housing projects are now in various stages of development, although most of them are far from completion. These 13 projects will involve the expenditure of $83,000,000 and will provide about 20,000 dwelling units. Sixteen other projects have been authorized. New York City and Chicago are asking for $25,000,000 each, while the New York City housing authority's advisory committee has suggested a 10-year rehousing program involving an expenditure of one and one-half billion dollars to meet the needs of that city. In the President's relief bill it is estimated that $450,000,000 might be made available for housing.

If anything effective is to be done to abolish the slums, to provide decent and comfortable homes for the masses, and to make a real dent on unemployment, a permanent Federal housing authority must be set up equipped to do business on a vast scale. Several bills have been drawn up with a view to do that very thing. Prominent among these is the bill of this organization, the People's Lobby. This bill provides for the establishment of a United States housing corporation with a capital stock of $1,000,000,000, subscribed by the Federal Government. The corporation would be managed by three directors, appointed by the Government for a period of 8 years.

It could issue bonds equal to five times the paid-in capital, buy real estate, and all equipment needed for houses, run factories for the manufacture of needed equipment, construct such dwellings as it may determine, fix standard prices, and determine rents. In order to prevent land speculators from holding up the public, the bill further provides that the unimproved or improved land purchased by the public be acquired at a figure "at which it is assessed by State or local assessment authorities, or on the basis of the average net income of the preceding 4 years, or the anticipated net income of the next 4 years, whichever shall be the lesser sum." It is imperative if the workers are to secure apartments at low rents that some method be devised to prevent the public from paying an unjust tribute to the country's realtors. The Council for Research on Housing Construction in Great Britain wisely maintained: "The control, and so far as is possible with justice, the reduction of land costs is as essential a factor in a sound housing policy as the control and reduction of building costs. The most far-reaching efforts to reduce the cost of building will be to no purpose, if under subsidy stimulus, land costs rise as fast as, or faster than building costs are cut down." Speculators have already been trying to play havoc with the building of low-rent apartments in many sections of the country.

It is essential that the problem of slum clearance and working-class housing be attacked in the boldest and most efficient and imaginative manner possible. The Federal Government should spend several billion dollars a year for a 10-year period on this phase of public works.

THE SOUTH AND COTTON

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Arizona Daily Star of Thursday, April 4, 1935, on the subject "The South and Cotton."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SOUTH AND COTTON

The results which have come from certain marketing policies in the cases of rubber, silk, coffee, and copper forecast definitely what is going to happen to cotton in the future. The same policies which have ruined copper, coffee, silk, and rubber are now being repeated in the case of cotton. The same results are beginning to appear. As the same policies are continued, the same final results are assured.

Take the case of copper as an example. America used to produce more than one-half of the copper used in the world. After the war demand was over, the copper industry adjusted itself to a peace-time basis. The price of copper fell from 32 cents to 12 cents. Even at 12 cents most of the mines of Arizona could make a fair, but not a large profit. Because America produced more than half of the world's copper, the American producers saw a chance to force up the price. So they formed the Copper Export Association under the Webb-Kenyon Act and began a policy of price-fixing. Slowly the price was forced up to 13 cents, then 14 cents, and then, as the demand continued and profits grew, excuses were found to force the price on up to 15 cents, 16 cents, 17 cents, and finally up to 24 cents with a final fixed price of 18 cents.

This artificially high price of copper created tremendous profits for all domestic producers and scandalously high profits for low-cost producers. The inevitable happened. Copper mining became so profitable that new ore deposits were sought. Moreover, they were found, found in huge quantities in Canada, Africa, and South America. Because copper mining was so profitable, financing of the development of these huge deposits was an easy matter. The technical skill was available. In a few years these new mines came into production. They had to sell their copper. The Copper Export Association could not control them. The American producers began storing their production, hoping for better times. Finally the load became too great. The price of copper crashed. An unsold surplus of 2,000,000,000 pounds hung over the market. The mines restricted their production. Many of them closed up and are still closed. In other words, the policy of price fixing made possible the development of more copper production than the world could consume. The closed mines of Arizona, the low prices of the metal throughout the world, the chaotic condition of the market, is the result. Instead of fixing the price when they raised it, the producers literally cut their own throats.

The same thing happened in the case of rubber when the British Government adopted the same fallacious policy. The same thing happened in the case of Brazil when that Government adopted the same policy in the case of coffee, and the same thing happened in the case of silk with Japan. New production and new substitutes in each case permanently ruined the market.

In spite of these glaring examples the new deal has inaugurated the same program in cotton production. The restricted production and the artificially high price of 12 cents inaugurated by the administration is having the same effect. The high price is now stimulating new production in Brazil where last year 1,200,000 bales were produced as compared with 300,000 bales previously. New production is going on in Africa, Russia, and India. In 1934 American manufacturers of ginning machinery exported five times as much machinery as they did the previous year. German chemists are perfecting substitutes out of beech trees. American exports of cotton for 1934 were one-half of what they were the previous year. More than 9,000,000 bales of unsold cotton are in domestic warehouses. The Government, in effect, owns 4,000,000 bales of that amount.

Meanwhile, although cotton landlords are prosperous, the reduction in acreage in the South has created a gigantic new social problem. What is to be done with the millions of Negroes in the South who know almost nothing but cotton farming, and who are now unemployed?

What about the future of the South when this new foreign production comes in? If the South grows other crops in place of cotton, what will their effect be on other parts of the country?

One conclusion is inescapable. The cotton business of America is being ruined and the chances are that 5 years from now cotton will sell for 5 or 6 cents a pound gold. The entire South will be almost as adversely affected as are the desolate and stranded people of the mining camps of Arizona today. A great industry, supporting many millions of people, is deliberately being ruined by official repetition of the same mistake which ruined the copper, the coffee, the rubber, the silk, and the nitrate industries of the world.

CAPITALISM—ADDRESS BY JOHN HENRY KIRBY

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD extracts from a speech by Hon. John Henry Kirby, of Houston, Tex.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

The statement is frequently made by our economic dilettantes that capitalism has proved a failure. In their zeal to introduce some new importations, these freshmen of thought insist that the desired measures of social renovation and community well-being cannot be secured through the existing system. It is argued that there must be some sort of a fusion of interests under Government direction, calling for full control of industry, of agriculture, and of pastoral and personal pursuits.

In other words, the thing sought is a receivership for the brain, brawn, and genius of American men and women.

Capitalism, stripped of popular misconceptions, simply means individual initiative, individual control, and the enjoyment of rewards in the Nation's business life individually earned and won. The United States evolved out of a contest started for the purpose of establishing private property rights in the Colonies and following the safeguarding of those rights in the Constitution, has moved forward rapidly in the happiest front any nation has yet attained. Here one may toil and save, and with his savings buy cattle or houses or mills or forests, and the management of such property is a personal matter. At least that was the conception of the sages who set up this Republic.

The most important victory ever won in armed contest or political controversy is the one that recognized the human right of acquisition and conservation.

It is the keystone in the arch of the temple of liberty.

Under the Constitution and our capitalistic system a wilderness was transformed into an industrial and agricultural empire. Through its heartening incentives flaming stacks have been erected above the Indians' camp fires and new stakes set out beyond the farthest frontier of enlightened progress. It has given the standard in weights and measurements. It has brought vast plains under the plow and found markets for their products. It has built railroads for the distribution of these products in America, and steamships to carry them out through the trade lanes of the world. It has made the Stars and Stripes a familiar sight in every port open to commerce. It has established reservoirs of wealth from which supplies are drawn, to launch new enterprises, and increase employment that labor may have new opportunities and higher rewards.

Prosperity existed under this system until it ceased to exist under every system. There was opportunity here for employment at high wages. Supply and demand were kept in reasonably close adjustment, and most families had a car, a radio, a comfortable home in which to live, plenty of food, and rare educational advantages for their children.

The tendency was constantly upward, and it is folly to say that the system through which our primal situation among the nations was secured suddenly collapsed, and that we must resort to a different plan. Turn to any other country with a different plan and see what you find. It will be darkness instead of light, terrorism instead of democracy, regimentation instead of individualism. The penury and squalor of the hut, the greedy hand of the government snatching bread from the mouths of those who produce it, a vampire of dreadful fear flapping its wings in utter darkness—that is what you will see and that is what is being offered the American as a substitute for the best form of government human wisdom has ever conceived.

In this country, under the capitalistic system, and under the Constitution, the poor of today may become the rich of tomorrow. If we will purge our land of strange and alarming heresies, and cling steadfastly to the old faith of the flag under which we marched to the heights of national attainment, we will witness the sunrise again. Manhood, genius, toil, and merit must be released from the iron hand of the Government with a full restoration of human rights.

Capitalism has not meant "a perfect day." Human frailties have existed and they will always exist, making it necessary to provide certain safeguards against any indifference to the principle of fair play. Progress towards justice has been steadier and has gone farther under our system than under any other system in other lands. We hear vaporings of a finer welding of human interest with the Government, of social face-lifting and benevolent adjustments. But bureaucracy is colder than pagan charity. It cannot be moved by a heartbeat or touched with a tear. In its metallic grasp it crushes hope and liberty.

We don't want it.

The thundering voice of reason calls for the re-Americanization of America. The need is for stalwart, self-reliant, red-blooded, two-fisted men with the jam-poles of liberty, to release the beaver dam of communism obstructing the stream of industry. Fugitive power, exercised outside of the Constitution is as threatening as the lightning bolt hurled angrily from a beclouded sky.

Any system that dynamites the pillars of independent commerce and industry is a deceiving mirage in a fool's desert.

We must have the freedom of energy, the right of skill, the liberty of choice. Every pine that lifts its plume above the level of the forest is a protest from God and nature against collectivism. We do not want a mill-cut subject with a single pattern to replace the American citizen whose character has been shaped by master craftsmen. We must not trade this matchless Government designed for us by immortal patriots whose wisdom has amazed the world, for one raked by political scavengers out of the garbage cans of Europe.

SCOTTISH WAR MEMORIAL AT EDINBURGH

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a very interesting article from the Buffalo Evening News of Saturday, April 6, 1935, entitled "Scotland Builds Defenders' Shrine."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Buffalo Evening News of Apr. 6, 1935]

SCOTLAND BUILDS DEFENDERS' SHRINE—MAJESTICALLY IT RISES ABOVE THE CASTLE WALLS ON THE BEETLING ROCK OVERLOOKING EDINBURGH, A NATION'S TRIBUTE TO SONS WHO FELL IN BATTLE—SENATOR COPELAND MOVES TO HAVE UNITED STATES SIMILARLY MEMORIALIZE HER WAR DEAD

Royal S. Copeland, Senator from New York, has introduced a bill for appointment of a commission to plan a suitable monument to the memory of the United States soldiers, sailors, and marines who died in the World War. It is pending before the Senate Library Committee.

This article by Mr. D. M. Mathieson tells of the Highland fervor and sentiment that went into planning and construction of the Scottish war memorial at Edinburgh. This noble monument might well serve as an inspiration for an edifice in memory of America's World War heroes.

The Scottish war memorial is a symbol of peace rather than war. * * * "The sanctuary of Scotland's anguish and love and pride", a shrine that links the living with the dead, a monument to the folly of war.

(By D. M. Mathieson)

"Scotland, remember these thy sons who fell,
Fighting far over sea,
For they in a dark hour remembered well
Their warfare learned of thee."

These lines reveal the spirit of the Scottish war memorial, raised to 100,000 of Scotland's sons who gave their lives in the Great War, and to the million more who marched out from their peaceful homes to fight on three continents and on five oceans and in every clime in the cause of the world's freedom. Scotland's national war memorial, for beauty and sublimity of design, wild grandeur in situation, and all-comprehensiveness in conception, is unequalled in the war memorials of the world.

Scotsmen in every corner of the earth have contributed to this casket of memories. The kings of Europe—Sweden, Greece, Belgium, and Denmark—the princes of India, the potentates of Egypt and the East, the ruling chiefs of Africa, and more than one Ambassador of the United States to the Court of St. James', have reverently bowed their heads and paid tribute within a memorial which is characteristic of a fighting race whose fierce history is rooted in the era when the Roman tried to conquer Britain.

The memorial is a deliberate and abiding gesture of Scots the world over, a great act of reverence and of love that will hearten generations to come. Never was memorial built that linked so intimately the immediate with the remoter past, that gave to what is new, the dignity that the older lacked. The sanctuary of Scotland's anguish and love and pride, has grown out of the materials of her past, reshaped by the tenderness and the arts of today.

Scotland, for so small a country, has made a far-flung impress upon the world. Its sons are the greatest pioneers and colonists; Canada is peopled by Scotsmen and their descendants, so too, is New Zealand, and India is largely run by Scots. The country has a population of about 5,000,000, less than one-half of the population of the city of London.

Edinburgh, the capital, is one of the preeminent show places of the world; it is of those things of the earth which can never die. There is the calm classicism of the modern city on the one side and the sinister medievalism on the other, and its modern Scots walk in streets like canyons between the tenement cliffs, the progenitor of the modern skyscraper, for before England and Scotland composed their difficulties, which kept the two nations in a perennial state of warfare, the people of the Scottish capital had to crowd themselves on the castle ridge and so the houses were raised, some as high as 20 stories.

In Edinburgh there are dark pools where the old flame and fierceness of the fifteenth century still seem to lurk wherein the reminder of the tragedy of their royal kings and their feudal nobles is eternally mirrored. Above the city towers the great beetling rock upon which is the largest castle in Europe. Within the castle walls the inhabitants of the entire city on more than one occasion found succor and shelter from the English soldiers who beleaguered the city.

It is on this vast tumble and majestic rock whose frowning castle dominated the old town during Edinburgh's fighting days, and now smiles protectingly alike over the ancient city and the new, that stands this fair memorial. The summit of the castle is 500 feet above the level of the Firth of Forth, across which one gazes to the highland hills. It was in the Firth of Forth within view of the castle that the combined fleets of the United States and Great Britain were anchored in the latter stages of the war.

The origin of the castle is lost in antiquity. The oldest building, still in use, the St. Margaret's chapel, was built about 1150 and next is David's tower built in 1367. The more ancient castle buildings, with the exception of the chapel, were completely destroyed in 1314 by the Earl of Moray in pursuance of King Robert the Bruce's policy to make the fortress untenable by the English. For 1,000 years before the castle had been the occupation of the Scots and in modern excavation many secret tunnelings which were used for escaping when the castle was surrounded have been laid bare.

When Scotland's war memorial came to be discussed the national mind turned almost intuitively to the pinnacle of the castle rock. The Duke of Atholl, who is the only noble in the British Isles who retains the ancient right of having an armed regiment of his own quartered at Blair Castle in the Highlands, was the most active protagonist for the memorial, and, curiously, the late Earl of Rosebery, who was recognized as the supreme orator of the British Empire and a great and loyal Scot, opposed the scheme to place the shrine on the castle, which, he contended, was associated not with peace but with all that was warlike in the rugged and bloody history of the nation. The memorial, however, went steadily forward and was completed 9 years ago at a cost of nearly $1,000,000.

All who took part in the war are remembered—the shepherd and the reaper, the sailor and the engineer, the weaver and the clerk, the girls who bravely marched out to serve behind the lines or work amidst the roar and the danger of the shell factories. The carrier pigeons, and the little canaries and mice, were not forgotten and have a niche to themselves. Carved under the replica of the cage of the canaries and the mice are the words "The tunnellers' friends."

Entering the memorial, right and left is the great hall of honor. We are at once impressed by the soaring arch which gives access to the shrine, and through it, for the brooding pendent figure of the great archangel silhouetted against the jeweled windows. The shrine bears much the same relation to the hall of honor as the sanctuary of a church to its nave. The hall is for record and remembrance; the shrine for those deep emotions that transcend individual sorrows and swell into a "sursum corda" for those who see what sacrifice has won for mankind.

Over the casket that enshrines the names of those who gave their lives that freedom might live there soars the central window of a group of seven. The steel casket, given by King George and Queen Mary, is built into a part of the living rock of the castle which was left protruding through the level of the floor.

The figure on the cross is not the dying Christ, but mankind in triumphant resurrection through suffering and sacrifice; the hands and feet are freed from the cross. The whole story of the seven windows in the shrine is less of "war" than of "the warring element in the destiny of man." In that form the qualities evoked by war can be recorded without comment; war is neither glorified nor condemned.

The form of the shrine made it desirable that the idea embodied in the subject should culminate in the central window, and the subject was planned for statement in three window groups, to be read thus:

1. The birth of war, in the two windows on the west wall.
2. Its overthrow, in the corresponding pair on the east wall.
3. Peace and praise, in the group of three facing northwest, north, and northeast.

The purpose of the bronze frieze which comes beneath the windows was to represent, so far as space would allow, the various types of Scottish soldiers and sailors who fought on the world-wide battle fronts, on the sea, and in the air; and to show them not in parade order, but in battle kit and working dress as they lived and died. Great attention has been paid to detail so that the frieze should be a true historical record for the future. All the Scottish regiments are represented and, so far as possible, all the various branches of the Imperial forces in which Scotsmen served. The women's services are also included, and even the animals and carrier pigeons, as mentioned above, have not been forgotten.

Brooding amid this wealth of story and of symbol hovers the impressive figure of St. Michael.

This great archangel is among the noblest of all Christian personages and symbols. The Archangel Raphael engages in kindly acts as guardian of all humanity. Michael is a judge, remote, austere. But his austerity thrills and in no wise repels; his remoteness serves but to add radiance to his majesty; in his might is infinite tenderness.

From earliest times he has been given preeminence over all created spirits as the witness of righteousness overcoming wrong, in the perpetual antagonism between the spirit of good and the spirit of evil. Captain of the heavenly hosts, he is conqueror of the powers of Hell; but he is captain also of all earthly hosts fighting in a just cause. He is conductor and guardian of the spirits of the dead.

And so he broods above the casket where lie written the 100,000 names of those who were faithful unto death.

The hall of honor forms an inner sanctuary. Here we find eight windows, all of pale glass, a practical thought, for there are many inscriptions on the walls to be studied and books of the dead to be read on the bronze lecterns before each regimental bay.

The four large windows include the record of gallant service by the Navy and the air force; the latter with the inscription, "I bare you on eagle's wings and brought you into myself." The four south windows form their complement, those representing war "at the front", these the "war as it manifested itself at home."

The entire series makes a complete presentation of the war as a whole. The main subjects of the south windows are: Guarding Cities from Aircraft (antiaircraft gun team); Embarkation; Return; and the Last Post; but the windows also are designed to symbolize the four seasons, representations of which fill the uppermost medallion in each window; and the ornament is based on flowers proper to each season. The casements contain a series of small medallions depicting Air Raid, Ambulance, Convoy of Ships, Minesweeping, the Manufacture of Cannon and Cartridges, Convalescence, and Guarding the Coast. In all this there is nothing of the waste and cruelty and filth of war; only the majesty of its sacrifices, the burning light of its courage, and the sanctity of its memories.

The long walls are divided into pillared arcades. In each arch is a memorial of a regiment. Here, for example, is seen the tablet to the Black Watch, Scotland's great fighting kilted regiment. The record of the Black Watch takes one in memory upon many of the great battlefields where were laid the foundations of the empire which now embraces nearly one-third of the world and is peopled by 600,000,000 in allegiance to the King. On this memorial are engraved the following, where the Black Watch fought:

Guadaloupe, 1759; Martinique, 1762; Havannah, North America, 1763–64; Mangalore; Mysore; Seringapatam; Corunna; Busaco; Fuentes; D'onor; Pyrenees; Nivelle; Nive; Orthes; Toulouse; The Peninsular War; Waterloo; the South African Wars of 1846–47, 1851–53; Alina; Sebastopol; the Indian Mutiny; the Relief of Lucknow; the Ashante War, 1873–74; Tel-el-Kebir; the Egyptian War, 1882–84; the Nile War, 1884–85; the South African War, 1899–90–1901–2.

On other tablets are given the almost endless battles in Flanders where the British armies fought through terror to triumph. What a majestic record of a regiment! The stranger of other lands as he stands in reverent awe before such a hallowed shrine realizes the unbending loyalty of the British people to noble and unsullied tradition.

The Peninsular War where Spain was broken, lasted 20 years; at Waterloo, Napoleon was finally shattered; at Sabastopol, the Russians were conquered. The South African war was one of the great achievements of the British armies. They fought through the veldt and crossed the mountain range where the Boers occupied picked positions, fortified by the finest implements of war, until they reached the Golden Rand. The Rand at Johannesburg is the greatest gold field ever discovered in the history of the world. It has produced untold millions.

What a record in one regiment! After the South African war, the Black Watch were fighting on the Indian frontier and then came the greatest of all wars.

Scotland is proud of her martial heritage, and has raised to her incomparable dead a monument which shall last through time.

"Their voices shall be heard
When ours are silent forever."

Can America capture the spirit and raise such a memorial at once beautiful and sacred to the honor of her sons who made the supreme sacrifice on Flanders' fields? There is no task before the architect of any country more exacting and more elusive than to recreate the traditions of the past without facing into mere archeological exercises which mean nothing but copyism. Nor is it enough that the architect shall devise on paper, forms that are fitting and beautiful in their own right. It is necessary that living hands, guided by acute intelligence, shall translate into stone and bronze and glass and wood, the conceptions of the architect with a perfect understanding of the limitations of material, in a lively sympathy with the purpose and character of the building as a whole. In a national style, consonant with the many strands in the web woven in the loom of time and which is called the United States, individual artists and individual craftsmen are highly important factors, and their knowledge must extend to the war memorials of Europe of which the one in Edinburgh is transcendently the one which satisfies the fullest range of human emotions.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, House bill 6021 is reported in amended form with 29 sections, and is intended to provide the relief necessary to complete the emergency task in the home-mortgage field, and at the same time to encourage and facilitate normal business in this field for the protection of home ownership and the welfare of the country. The statute has placed the responsibility upon the Federal Home Loan Bank Board for the operation of Home Owners' Loan Corporation for immediate and direct governmental relief to individual home owners and also for the operation of the Federal home-loan bank system, the Federal savings and loan system, and the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation to bring about more normal, sound, and economic financing of homes on a private basis. This bill affects all of these operations and deals with a problem which is vital to continued home ownership. I will undertake to outline the situation with which we are dealing.

When the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933 was enacted it was estimated that the home owners of the country owed more than $21,000,000,000, secured by their homes; that more than $5,000,000,000 of this debt was hopelessly in default; and that the owners were unable to pay this large sum of defaulted debt in cash, and in large measure the mortgagees were unable to grant the necessary extensions. Already at that time many hundreds of thousands of homes had been lost by their owners by foreclosure, and the danger of the loss of more than a million other homes at foreclosure sale and the consequences of such losses necessitated the original legislation in June 1933. The original bill authorized the creation of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, with $200,000,000 of capital, subscribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and authorized the issue of $2,000,000,000 in bonds, the interest upon which was guaranteed by the United States. By the act of April 27, 1934, the Corporation was authorized to issue bonds guaranteed as to principal and interest by the United States. By the act of June 27, 1934, known as the "National Housing Act", the authorized bond issue of the Corporation was increased to $3,000,000,000, and the Home Owners' Loan Act was further amended to provide for contingencies which had arisen in the administration of the Corporation. The present bill provides for the further increase of the authorized bond issue of the Corporation by $1,750,000,000 to a total of $4,750,000,000.

At the end of December 1933 the Corporation had received 751,578 applications for a total amount of $2,266,527,835 in loans, and had closed 36,310 loans for $103,257,858. By March 28, 1935, the Corporation had received a total of 1,744,420 applications for $5,677,635,065 in loans and had closed 839,720 loans for a total of $2,536,044,126. On March 28 the Corporation held 530,654 applications which had been either withdrawn or were temporarily held in suspense and had 374,046 applications pending. It is reported that the pending applications have had considerable work done on them, and a high percentage of them will result in loans, and that many of the applications held in suspense will be finally adjusted and will result in loans. Estimates have been given to the committee that there is a probability of closing from 400,000 to 500,000 additional loans. The loans heretofore closed have averaged $3,016 each. It is estimated that the resources provided in this bill will provide for all of the eligible cases and at the same time make provision for the other purposes of the bill.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Under the provisions of the bill as reported, will priority be given to pending applications?

Mr. BULKLEY. Undoubtedly priority will be given to pending applications; in fact, no new applications are authorized except under certain limited circumstances which the Senator will find set out in the bill. There is a limitation of the circumstances under which new applications may be accepted at all.

Mr. COSTIGAN. By the statement that no new applications are to be considered, does the able Senator from Ohio suggest that no new applications will be received after the date when the bill shall become law, or after the current date?

Mr. BULKLEY. The Senator no doubt knows that last November the Corporation stopped receiving applications, on the ground that a sufficient number had already been received to exhaust all the funds which had been authorized, and no applications have been received since that time.

In the bill as reported to the Senate the following language is found:

> In order to provide for applications heretofore filed, for applicants who in good faith prior to the date this amendment takes effect, sought relief by formal application, letter, or other written memorandum, and who file their applications within 60 days after this amendment takes effect.

Mr. FLETCHER. What section is that?

Mr. BULKLEY. Section 11, page 23. I take it that it is still possible at this time for an application to be filed, which must be refiled formally within 60 days after the passage of the bill, provided, of course, that the language suggested in the bill shall be adopted by the Congress and shall become law.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Senator interpret that language to mean that all those who have heretofore filed applications and have them now pending have got to refile them within 60 days?

Mr. BULKLEY. No; I do not.

Mr. BARKLEY. I did not think the Senator meant that.

Mr. BULKLEY. No; I meant to indicate to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN] that there was a possibility of further applications being filed at this time.

Mr. BARKLEY. In addition to those already on file?

Mr. BULKLEY. Certainly, in addition to those already on file, because the first clause distinctly provides for applications heretofore filed, and those heretofore filed, no doubt, can be acted on without any further action on the part of the applicant.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BULKLEY. Yes.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Is it to be understood that applicants may file at this time, or that the prohibition against filing still attaches, and the new opportunity to file will begin when the bill shall become law?

Mr. BULKLEY. I suppose, technically, that the board has not rescinded its order refusing to take applications; but the language which I have just read provides:

> Who in good faith prior to the date this amendment takes effect, sought relief by formal application, letter, or other written memorandum.

So notwithstanding that the application might not be technically accepted by the corporation, there could be no doubt that the writing of a letter at this time would be effective if the bill should be enacted as proposed by the committee.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield.

Mr. DUFFY. Of course, we all know of many instances where, perhaps, the most deserving people, those who have struggled the longest to keep off the relief rolls and to keep from applying to the Government, have used up all the little resources which they may have saved and who now have come to the point where they need relief just as badly, or more so, than many of those who have received relief. They are mostly at this time under the impression that there is nothing left for them, because of the prohibition that is apparently now in effect and because, as they understand, of the failure of the proposed new law to provide for the granting of any additional applications. I am very glad to hear the Senator say that there is a possibility of them getting in under the wording of the pending bill.

Mr. BULKLEY. The pending bill certainly does not provide in a general way for new applications. It undertakes to cut off new applications, because if we shall not at some time cut them off, there will be almost no limit to the number of applications which may be sent to the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, and we might be in the position of carrying the entire home-mortgage loan business of the country if we did not cut them off at some time. However, the House has thought and your committee has thought that the action on the part of the Corporation last November in refusing to accept further applications was so abrupt that some leeway ought to be given to those who were cut off so sharply at that time.

Mr. COSTIGAN. In other words, Mr. President, if I understand the Senator, if the new applicant is diligent now he may have an opportunity to have his application considered.

Mr. BULKLEY. If this language shall be adopted, and the applicant now files a letter or written memorandum, it does not make any difference whether the Corporation has heretofore received his application or not, but in such case he must renew his effort in the form of a formal application within 60 days after the passage of the proposed act.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish the Senator would be a little more definite, because I am in doubt, after listening to his answers to the queries that have been propounded. If this bill should become a law, would it prevent an application being made by some person who had not theretofore made application for a loan?

Mr. BULKLEY. The funds authorized by this bill are available only for applicants, first, who have already filed, and, second, who before the passage of this proposed act shall by formal application, letter, or other written memorandum make an effort to file. That is all.

Mr. NORRIS. What is the idea of the Senator in fixing such a limitation which would prohibit anyone, no matter how worthy, from making an application the next day after this bill should become a law?

Mr. BULKLEY. Unless he had filed a letter or memorandum before that time.

Mr. NORRIS. Does not the Senator believe that there are thousands of persons who would like to apply under the law, and who have no notice and would have no notice until the bill had been passed? Why would it not be much better to fix in the law some date in the future when the applications would be limited?

Mr. BULKLEY. The committee considered that question quite carefully. We believe that the provision we have placed in the bill is sufficiently liberal, because there is public notice of the fact that this bill is under consideration. There is that leeway now to those who apply at this time, and there would be logically no day which we could fix as a date when applications must close. It will always be a matter of opinion, and there will always be some people who will want more time to apply, no matter how long in advance the date might be fixed.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not trying to hunt up people to make applications or induce them to make applications, but I believe it will be found to be absolutely true that a great many worthy persons will be precluded from acting just because they did not have technical notice, as they would have if we put in the bill a reasonable length of time, say, 90 days, or such matter as that. That would be given great publicity, and everybody would understand it. I anticipate that if the bill shall not be amended we will find afterward that there will be a very great number of people who are just as worthy as those who have been accommodated with loans who will importune us to change the law so that they may make applications, and they will be able to say that they never had any notice of the date when this proposed law went into effect and had no way of finding out that it would be necessary for them to make application before the law was passed. That is something out of the ordinary.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, there is a great deal of force in what the Senator says, of course, but the question is how far do we want to go with this business? We started out to set up a $2,000,000,000 bond issue. Subsequently we increased it to $3,000,000,000. Now, at a time when the Treasury asks us to confine our additional authorization of a bond issue to $1,250,000,000, we are proposing to raise it to $4,750,000,000. A step in the direction suggested by the Senator from Nebraska would undoubtedly still further increase the amount of bonds which it will be necessary to issue.

Mr. NORRIS. It would; but at the same time it would keep our hands clean. We would be fair to everybody, as we ought to be. We cannot afford to do anything else. Here we are asked to enact a law, but I do not know and the Senator from Ohio does not know and no one knows when it will become effective. I never heard before today, and I suppose no one in the United States has ever yet heard that this measure is going to provide that no application shall be received after the bill shall be enacted into law.

Mr. BULKLEY. I think the Senator is mistaken about that, because we have not materially changed the language of the bill as it passed the House. A statement to that effect was carried in the newspapers, and the public has had very reasonable notice of the intention of Congress.

Mr. BARKLEY. Aside from that, the public would have 60 days in which to make application.

Mr. BULKLEY. The 60-day provision does not do any good unless they have done something about the matter before the passage of the act.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is the very point about which I inquired a while ago of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BULKLEY. I regret if I did not make it entirely clear. There will be no new applications received after the passage of the act, according to the language of the bill as it is reported; but anyone who, before the passage of the act, made an effort, evidenced by written memoranda that he has tried to get a loan, may, by renewing that effort in the form of a formal application within 60 days after the passage of the act, get his loan.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. How much has the Home Owners' Loan Corporation already loaned?

Mr. BULKLEY. About $2,500,000,000.

Mr. FLETCHER. The time when applications must cease, of course, will be limited by the amount they are authorized to loan, $4,750,000,000. When they shall have exhausted that fund there must be an end to the business. I take it we cannot fix the date when that will occur. It may run for a year or for 2 years. We cannot tell when that fund will be exhausted, but the Board will undoubtedly apprehend when it will be exhausted and will be authorized to give notice that no more applications will be received after a certain time.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I believe the Senator from Florida has not caught the purport of the language. If the bill is enacted the way it is reported by the committee there will be no possibility of any further applications after the enactment of the law. The formal applications referred to are to be filed only by those who made a previous effort before the enactment of the law.

Mr. NORRIS. In effect it will be that no new applications will be received and no one can obtain any relief under the measure unless he has tried previously to get relief and failed.

Mr. BULKLEY. That is correct. Further, along the line about which the Senator from Nebraska has inquired, it is fair to say that although applications were terminated very suddenly by the Corporation last November and without any previous notice, the Corporation officers have testified before our committee that they have had very little complaint from people who thought they ought to have had a right to apply.

Mr. NORRIS. I think that would be natural. They do not blame the officers. I myself am not finding fault with them. They had to quit. They exhausted their funds. They had more applications than they had money to loan. The people who did not complain were allowed to believe that Congress, when it convened, would very likely extend the relief, as it would other forms of relief, and there would be ample opportunity then to make application. Thousands of people dropped the matter then and there, waiting for Congress to extend the law, all of whom are going to be shut out if the law is not enacted, as the Senator from Ohio has said.

Mr. BULKLEY. I think those who were encouraged to hope for benefits under the law were rather those who had filed applications which had not progressed into the legal department. The Corporation last November, when it ceased receiving new applications, also ceased to pass on the applications which had already been received but which had not yet reached the legal department on the ground that there was not enough credit available to take care of the applications already filed.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think the experience of all of us is rather the same with reference to the situation. Practically all letters I have received came from people who had filed applications and had been notified that no further loans were to be made. I do not recall that anyone who had not taken up the matter with the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, either through the State manager or local district manager, ever wrote to me making any complaint that loans had been shut off.

Mr. BULKLEY. That is precisely the point I was trying to bring to the attention of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think we have to draw the line and we have to stop the Home Owners' Loan Corporation lending at some time. I have some doubt whether, as to those who undertook to obtain loans, who wrote in about them, or went to the trouble to go to the district office to inquire about the terms under which they could obtain loans, we ought to require them to renew their applications and take further action within 60 days. I think some injustice might result. By reason of their failure to get loans at the time, they went home not knowing whether they ever could get them, discouraged and disappointed, and abandoning their efforts. If we are going to require them to refile their applications or start anew within 60 days, if they simply wrote a letter or made inquiry and did not file a formal application, I think we ought to require the Home Owners' Loan Corporation to follow up those cases to ascertain whether or not the parties still desire to pursue their applications or their efforts by filing a formal application. That could be very easily cured by some additional language.

Mr. BULKLEY. I have no doubt the Corporation could do it without any additional language in the bill. It would be good practice to do so.

Mr. BARKLEY. But someone who does not know about the technical requirement to start over again within 60 days would not then be left out because of lack of knowledge. If the language is to be left as it is, the Corporation itself ought to be impressed with the desirability of following up the written applications which have been turned down because no more were being received at that time.

Mr. BULKLEY. I am quite in accord with that thought and should have no objection to putting such a provision in the bill, although I do not believe it to be necessary.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. Keeping in mind the colloquy between the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Ohio as to the situation of previous applicants, may I inquire if there is anything in the bill that gives precedence to those who have previously made application, whose applications are pending, or is it possible to recognize them as having precedence in order to avoid new loans or new applications under the bill?

Mr. BULKLEY. I think it wholly unnecessary, because those who have already applied have had their applications progress partly through the works already, and they naturally would be handled first in the regular order of business. No; it is not necessary for them to make any new application.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. MURPHY. It occurs to me that when the fact became known that the Home Owners' Loan Corporation could make no more loans, many persons in distress thereafter made no applications, because they recognized the futility of doing so. As to them, there is nothing in the files of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, in any of its offices, indicating their desire to be refinanced. They are given only until the date this measure becomes law to indicate that desire by letter or other message to the Home Owners' Loan Corporation.

The Senator from Ohio has indicated that a great deal of information has gone out to the public about the prospective refinancing, and that the public is informed. I am frank to say that I had no knowledge whatsoever until this morning as to the plan in contemplation by the committee. If I am to be of service and if this organization is to be of service to the people of my State or to the people of the States represented by the other Senators, we must in frantic haste go through our files seeking to send out letters and telegrams to persons who have not applied for loans who are in distress, urging upon them the necessity of getting in immediately a telegram or a letter to make of record the fact that they desire to be refinanced.

Inasmuch as I, who might be presumed as a Senator to have some knowledge of what was impending, had no knowledge of it until this moment, is it not rather violent to presume that people scattered throughout the States will have such knowledge, or already have it? Would it not be possible, would it defeat any good end to admit some period beyond the effective date of this act, a period that might be merely 30 days, to enable people now in distress and who have given no notice of their desire to be refinanced to give some indication of that desire?

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, a Senator is preoccupied with many subjects in his official capacity as a Senator, and all of us know how severe the pressure is. The bill before us passed the House just about a month ago, with the provision in it substantially as reported by your committee here. Clearly, every Member of the other House from the Senator's State must have known, and clearly the newspapers of the Senator's State and of all States must have carried the provisions of the House bill, and must have given notice to prospective borrowers as to what they should do if they desired to protect their possibility of becoming borrowers.

Of course, it is possible to add a few more days; it is possible to add a few more months; but the point is that the longer we keep this privilege open, the more opening we give, the more loans we are going to be obliged to make.

This bill, as it was agreed upon by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation Board and the Treasury Department, who had a conference on the subject by request of the President before the matter was brought up in either House, provided that no new applications should be received under any circumstances, and that the additional amount to be made available by authorization to the Corporation to issue bonds should be confined to a billion and a quarter dollars. It has been agreed between the House on the one hand and our committee on the other that a somewhat more liberal course should be taken. The result has been the language presented here, protecting everybody who heretofore has made a good-faith effort to get a loan, protecting the prospective borrower even up to the time of the enactment of this measure, and increasing by half a billion dollars the amount of credit available. There is no magic in any one particular date or in any one particular figure; but unless the Senator advocates going on without limit we must put a limit somewhere, and I submit that the limit we have provided in the bill is as reasonable as any limit that anybody can suggest.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BULKLEY. I do.

Mr. DUFFY. Assuming that the applications on file, which were shut off, will be granted in the same proportion that applications were granted theretofore, about how much money is it estimated will be required to take care of those loans? In other words, does the one and three-quarter billion dollars the Senator is talking about automatically practically limit the loans to the applications which are now on file, rather than opening up to any considerable extent the opportunity for new applications to be filed?

Mr. BULKLEY. It is difficult to be certain as to so large an amount; but the fact is that on March 28 the Corporation had 374,046 applications pending which were presumed to be good applications which would result in loans. In addition to that, there were 530,654 applications which were in suspense; that is to say, they were held up perhaps by a question of title, perhaps by the refusal of the mortgagee to accept the bonds of the Corporation and go through with the transaction, or for some other reason. A large proportion of those applications will be renewed and will be adjusted and will be eligible for loans, but nobody can tell how many. The best estimate that the Home Owners' Loan Corporation has been able to make is that about a billion and a half dollars will be required to take care of applications already on file. We are also providing authority for the Corporation to buy debentures of the home-loan banks, and to invest in savings-and-loan associations for the purpose of providing more local funds for loaning on homes; and we have made available $300,000,000 of this amount for that purpose. We have not so segregated it that they are obliged to subtract the $300,000,000 from the funds otherwise available for home loans, but we do make that amount available, and they estimate that they are going to need about that much for that purpose; so, as nearly as it can be estimated by those in authority, the amount provided by the bill is just about enough to take care of the situation.

The liberalization which we have already made here by permitting the filing of written memoranda, to be followed by formal application within 60 days after the enactment of the law, will somewhat increase the legitimate demand on the Corporation; but the officers have testified that so far as they can estimate it, they think they will be able to take care of it within the limits here provided; but I do not think we would be justified in extending the limit without also increasing the amount of the credit which we make available.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I desire to be sure that I understand the Senator. Is it true that a home owner who has heretofore made no application whatever can write a letter, between the time this bill passes the Senate and the time the President signs it, indicating his desire for a loan, and if he follows it with a formal application within 60 days after the signature of the President he is eligible within this restriction? Is that correct?

Mr. BULKLEY. He is eligible so far as this restriction is concerned. Of course, he would have to be otherwise eligible, too.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I understand that.

Mr. BULKLEY. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Now I desire to ask the Senator another question. I think I heard him say that the Treasury Department officials testified that they wished the committee would limit this particular draft upon the public credit to a billion and a quarter dollars additional of bonds.

Mr. BULKLEY. That is correct.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Did the Treasury undertake to sustain that proposition? Did they submit any argument upon it?

Mr. BULKLEY. No; there was no argument about it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I should like to ask the Senator whether any inference is to be drawn from this suggestion by the Treasury that we are approaching the exhaustion of the Government's borrowing capacity?

Mr. BULKLEY. I do not think it is so much a question of exhausting the Government's borrowing capacity. I think it is rather a question of the time when bonds might be marketed, and whether it would interfere with other operations of the Treasury.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator does not read into this request any suggestion that we are close to a danger signal?

Mr. BULKLEY. My own inference is what I have stated.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I desire to reinforce the statement made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY]. I believe there are many people who have looked to the enactment of this proposed legislation for relief from the situation confronting them so far as their home ownership and the refinancing of their loans is concerned. I agree completely with what the Senator from Iowa has said, that the people in the States are not upon notice that applications filed either in the form of letters or in the form of written memoranda would place them in the position of being eligible to make formal application within 60 days after the enactment of this bill.

Mr. BULKLEY. In that connection, what does the Senator consider notice?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am not criticizing anybody. Perhaps I did not choose my words well. What I meant is that I do not believe there is general information current among home owners in this country that this particular provision is in the bill, and that they would place themselves in the position of being eligible for consideration of their formal applications if they had filed letters or written memoranda indicating their desire to come under the terms of the bill.

The Senator from Ohio and all other Senators must be aware of the fact that so far as the average citizen is concerned, the language contained in a bill of this nature and its provisions do not become matters of common knowledge. It is true that there may be some little story about it in the newspaper in the citizen's home town, but as I have gone about my own State and about other States, what has impressed me concerning the varied activities of the Government in connection with efforts to meet these tragic economic conditions is the fact that people are not aware, even after the long-continued activities of various agencies, of their rights or privileges or opportunities under those various agencies.

Therefore I believe that in all justice some provision should be made along the lines suggested by the Senator from Iowa, to afford the people additional time, some reasonable time, after the enactment of the bill, within which to file their applications.

I venture the assertion that if we were able to contact the average home owner in need of this type of relief in Ohio, or in Wisconsin, or in any other State, we would find that a great majority of them are under the impression and are hoping that when this bill shall be enacted, there will be some limited and reasonable opportunity for them to make application to secure the benefits of the act. I hope that before the bill shall be acted upon some amendment will be proposed which will extend for a reasonable period after the enactment of the law the time within which persons may file applications and have them considered.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, as I have said, there is no magic date which must be right and all other dates wrong. I quite agree with that. I do think that this is a different case from the publicity attaching to the mere introduction of a bill, or even to the report of a committee, because this bill passed the House more than a month ago containing almost exactly the same provisions now in it, and I do believe it has been very well publicized, and that if the newspapers have been to any extent negligent, they will make up for it now as a result of the debate we are having here.

I think also that if we should provide a 30-day leeway, there would still be worthy borrowers who would come around and find out about it on the 31st day, after their rights had expired. There is no absolute limit to be found which will satisfy everyone. I believe we have suggested as reasonable a limit as can be suggested.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. May I simply submit, by way of evidence, that I have just inquired of every Senator within reach of my voice as to whether he knew this provision was in the bill, and none of the Senators knew it, nor did I.

Mr. BULKLEY. I have just indicated that I think Senators are more engrossed in other matters than are the home owners.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I venture the assertion that not one-half of 1 percent of the home owners in any State in the Union who are in such a situation as that they would need relief under the terms of the bill have any knowledge of its provisions, and that they are going to be estopped from having any consideration accorded them after the bill shall be enacted.

Mr. BULKLEY. How will they find out about it if we give them 30 days?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If 30 days shall be given, that will be a reasonable length of time within which those who are interested may find out about it. In other words, it will be printed and published that an opportunity will be afforded them. As a matter of fact, I may say to the Senator that I think the moment this bill becomes law, the agencies of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation will be called upon by thousands of people all over the United States who are under the impression that the enactment of the bill will have given them further opportunity, following the sudden cutting off of applications in November, to have considered their applications for refinancing their homes.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I say to the Senator from Ohio, in charge of the pending measure, that I am still greatly concerned as to whether there is any provision in the bill which will give some assurance to those whose applications are already on file that it will be themselves who will be given precedence, and whether, under the bill, we can prevent new applications, referred to by the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Michigan, from being filed in sufficient number to absorb the whole fund before those whose applications have been already filed will have been able to be served?

Mr. BULKLEY. Frankly, I cannot conceive of the Corporation displacing applications which are already in process of examination in favor of new applications. It seems to me that those whose applications are already on file have a natural advantage, and that in the normal course of business they would be taken care of first.

Mr. VANDENBERG. How can new applications crowd out old applications if there are not to be any new ones?

Mr. BULKLEY. Of course, there is authority for the taking of a limited number of new ones under the provision we have just been discussing.

Mr. VANDENBERG. It is limited?

Mr. BULKLEY. It is limited.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6359) to repeal certain provisions relating to publicity of certain statements of income.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 115) to amend section 27 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1920, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The message further announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bill, and it was signed by the Vice President:

S. 1308. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Cairo, Ill.

REPEAL OF PUBLICITY SECTION OF REVENUE ACT OF 1934—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio permit me to present the conference report on the so-called "pink slip" bill and have it considered at this time? I would not ask the Senator to yield, except that I must go to a committee meeting in a few minutes. I may say to the Senator that I do not think there will be any extended discussion of the report; indeed, there may not be any discussion, because practically the amendment adopted in the Senate was agreed to in conference.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I understand that the consideration of the conference report would not displace the pending business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It would not. It is a privileged matter.

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I submit the report and ask that the Senate proceed to its consideration.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask that the conference report be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The conference report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6359) to repeal certain provisions relating to publicity of certain statements of income, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the text of the bill, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"amended to read as follows:

"'(b) (1) All income returns filed under this title for any taxable year beginning after December 31, 1934 (or copies thereof, if so prescribed by regulations made under this subsection), shall be open to inspection by any official, body, or commission, lawfully charged with the administration of any State tax law, if the inspection is for the purpose of such administration or for the purpose of obtaining information to be furnished to local taxing authorities as provided in paragraph (2). The inspection shall be permitted only upon written request of the governor of such State, designating the representative of such official, body, or commission to make the inspection on behalf of such official, body, or commission. The inspection shall be made in such manner, and at such times and places, as shall be prescribed by regulations made by the Commissioner with the approval of the Secretary.

"'(2) Any information thus secured by any official, body, or commission of any State may be used only for the administration of the tax laws of such State, except that upon written request of the governor of such State any such information may be furnished to any official, body, or commission of any political subdivision of such State, lawfully charged with the administration of the tax laws of such political subdivision, but may be furnished only for the purpose of, and may be used only for, the administration of such tax laws. Any officer, employee, or agent of any State or political subdivision, who divulges (except as authorized in this subsection, or when called upon to testify in any judicial or administrative proceeding to which the State or political subdivision, or such State or local official, body, or commission, as such, is a party) any information acquired by him through an inspection permitted him or another under this subsection shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall upon conviction be punished by a fine of not more than $1000, or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or both.'"

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the title of the bill, and agree to the same.

PAT HARRISON,
WM. H. KING,
WALTER F. GEORGE,
HENRY W. KEYES,
JESSE H. METCALF,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

R. L. DOUGHTON,
SAM B. HILL,
THOS. H. CULLEN,
ALLEN T. TREADWAY,
ISAAC BACHARACH,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, before the conference report is considered, may I inquire of the Senator from Mississippi whether or not he has conferred with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN] and discussed the matter with him?

Mr. HARRISON. I have, and the Senator from Colorado is very much in favor of the report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Mississippi?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the conference report.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, there was nothing in disagreement with reference to the repeal of the so-called "pink slip" provision of the law. The only matter in disagreement was the so-called "Costigan amendment", and the Costigan amendment sought to give certain subdivisions of the various States the right to look over income-tax returns.

The Senate will recall that under an Executive order of the President, upon the request of the Governor of a State, any State officer charged with the duty of tax enforcement could, under such rules and regulations as should be prescribed by the President, examine income-tax returns. The Costigan amendment sought to enlarge the provision so that the representatives of cities might have that opportunity. In conference that was agreed to. The only difference was that the representatives of the cities must make requests to the Governors of the States, and obtain the reports through the Governors, just as other State officers would have to do.

The other change is that providing that the law shall become operative next year and not this year. The reason for that was that it was pointed out by the Treasury authorities that if it should become immediately operative, there might be so many persons coming at one time to examine tax returns that it might hamper the administration of the law; that the returns now being made might not be in the Department here, but might be in the offices of the collectors in the particular districts in which the taxpayers lived, and that that might result in some confusion. So it was suggested, and finally agreed to, that so far as the Costigan amendment was concerned, the law should begin to operate the first of next year.

It was pointed out to the Treasury officials—and we would have written it into the law if we had had power, but we were afraid it might subject the report to a point of order if we did it—that duplicate returns might be made, and that one of the returns should remain in the office of the collector in the particular district, the other being forwarded to Washington, the one being kept in the collector's office in which the resident might live for the convenience of the local officials, so as to save them from having to come all the way to Washington.

The Treasury officials have promised that that procedure will be started next year. They have a right to do it under the rules and regulations dealing with policy provided in the present law. So that is practically the only change which was made in the Costigan amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it seems to me the conference report has not made a penalty severe enough for the crime. As I heard it read, anyone who divulges any information which he derives from a taxpayer's return must pay a fine of $1,000 and go to jail for 6 months.

Mr. HARRISON. I may say to the Senator that the Costigan amendment provided for a fine of not less than $500 as a minimum nor more than $1,000 as a maximum, for divulging information, except as prescribed in the amendment; namely, when called upon to testify in the courts, and so on, or to do so in the collection of taxes. The only change which was made in that case was that we fixed no minimum for the fine. We made the provision as it is in the law today in similar cases. The provision runs through the law that the maximum punishment may be a year in prison, or a fine of $1,000, leaving it to the discretion of the trial judge to fix the fine down to the minimum if he sees fit.

We did not feel that it was proper simply to provide a fine. We thought there might be provision for imprisonment. We did not think it was particularly fair to say that a fine should be not less than $500. We thought there might be cases where the defendant might show such extenuating circumstances that the fine should be less than $500.

Mr. NORRIS. I should think there might be, and there would be in most cases, a necessity of increasing the fine and increasing the imprisonment. This is a serious matter, Mr. President. We have departed from the secrecy with which we have heretofore enshrouded income-tax returns by permitting some Governor or some tax official authorized by the Government to look behind the scenes and see what the returns really are. It is a serious proposition that these sacred things should be looked at by the inquiring eyes of those who perhaps are seeking to levy a tax upon some millionaire who has not fully disclosed his income. That ought to be guarded against by a more serious penalty; and if secrecy is violated, if these holy secrets are made public or get out in any way, the violator can be fined only a thousand dollars, and cannot be sent to jail for more than a year.

Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Mississippi whether he is now satisfied that the law provides sufficient safeguards so that there is no danger of kidnapers getting hold of taxpayers and kidnaping them? Has he safeguarded it so that the country may be free from this danger of kidnaping on account of information which might go out about a man's income-tax return?

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator will permit me, I will say that his sarcasm is always refreshing to me, but I have never made that argument, because I have never believed in it.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know whether or not the Senator from Mississippi made it. It has been made very often. It has been made on the floor of the Senate by a number of Senators, and it has been made in the newspapers. Hundreds of letters have come to Senators containing that argument. In fact, it has had a great influence. I suppose that is what brought about the passage of the law repealing the "pink slip" provision, because there have been so many cases of kidnaping lately. It was my idea, and it has been the idea, I think, of others, that we have now saved the country from the danger of kidnaping, and have now ended the kidnaping epidemic, unless it shall be revived by the provision of the bill which enables a Governor and his appointees to snoop around, engage in the snooping business, and find out something which is sacred and which ought never to be divulged to anyone.

Mr. HARRISON. I move the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Mississippi whether in his judgment the language as reported by the conference committee is subject to the construction which I give it, that the Governor by one request may secure access for the appropriate official to all the returns for his State? Or does the Senator construe the language as requiring a separate request in the case of each individual income-tax return?

Mr. HARRISON. My construction is that it would require a separate request.

Mr. COSTIGAN. That is not my interpretation.

Mr. HARRISON. I may be wrong in that construction, but if the Senator will note the request, in the end, is subject to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, but I do not believe that the Treasury Department would accept a blanket request from a Governor who wrote with respect to every tax assessor in every city in the State of Colorado or in the State of Mississippi, "I hope that you give him access to the returns." I think there ought to be separate requests, and I think the Treasury would construe the language to mean that there should be separate requests.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The language of the conference report, as I read it, if I have a correct copy, is as follows, in part:

> All income returns filed under this title for any taxable year beginning after December 31, 1934, shall be open to inspection by any official body or commission.

The words just read are followed by a clause in the second subdivision reading in part:

> Any information thus secured by an official body or a commission——

Which "information" I assume refers to information in all returns, or in separate returns—

> may be used only for the administration of the tax laws of such States, except that upon written request of the Governor of such State any such information may be furnished to any official body or commission.

My construction is that, by a single request addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury, or the Commissioner, all returns would be opened to the properly authorized representative of State tax officials.

Mr. HARRISON. I may say that our expert thinks that the requests may come in groups or by special classifications, but in the end, as the Senator will see, it is up to the regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury. I suppose that he would take into consideration the definiteness of the request.

Mr. COSTIGAN. If group requests may be made, I am even more strongly fortified in the construction of the language which I have been attempting to state.

May I add that if separate requests are necessary the amendment, in my judgment, will be shorn of much of the advantage which I interpret it as having, as reported by the conference committee. In part, my support of this conference report is related to the fact that I have long been an advocate of both proper knowledge and publicity of income-tax returns, and that my position has always been in support of as much publicity as possible.

The substitute for "pink slip" repeal, if not unduly hampered by regulations or restrictions caused by excessive caution of the Treasury Department, will constitute a constructive contribution to our present taxation system, especially at the base; and, by amendment or otherwise hereafter, the congressional intention expressed in this amendment to promote Federal, State, and local cooperation, and the needed and sound reorganization of our taxation system from top to bottom, will be greatly helped toward realization by the action being taken today.

In general, on the assumption that I correctly read the conference report, I conclude that the conference committee is enabling us to make a noteworthy contribution to our legislative record.

Finally, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD certain telegrams recently sent to the Secretary of the Treasury, Representative A. J. SABATH, of Illinois, and the Interstate Commission on Conflicting Taxation, commendatory of the amendment which is the subject of the conference report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The telegrams referred to are as follows:

APRIL 3, 1935.

Hon. HENRY MORGENTHAU,
Secretary of the Treasury,
Department of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.:

On behalf of those larger cities throughout the United States which by law are charged with the public responsibility of assessment and collection of both tangibles and intangibles, we urge you to vigorously support the action of the Senate in passing the Costigan amendment to the so-called "pink-slip-repeal bill." This matter is now in conference and undoubtedly the Treasury will be consulted by the conferees. We know that powerful interests do not want the Costigan amendment approved, because without such a provision these interests are evading local assessment and taxation. The Treasury of the United States is being called upon to finance relief and other activities in every community of the Nation. Certainly the Federal Government should do everything possible to help cities and States to help themselves. If tax evasion can be stopped, local revenues will be materially increased and substantial local contribution for relief and public works would be possible.

Respectfully,

DANIEL W. HOAN,
Mayor of Milwaukee, President of the United States Conference of Mayors.
PAUL V. BETTERS,
Executive Director, United States Conference of Mayors.

CHICAGO, ILL., March 29, 1935.

Hon. A. J. SABATH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Regarding Costigan amendment to H. R. 6359 I am vitally interested that this amendment do pass. Its effect on uniform assessments makes it highly desirable to all assessing officials; however this information to be restricted to them. This information, if available to the Cook County assessor, would result in a large rate reduction to the owners of real estate and other forms of tangible personal property such as machinery which is used in industry and merchandise. It will revive business in these activities and by so doing create more employment.

JOHN S. CLARK, County Assessor.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The following telegrams were received by the Interstate Commission on Conflicting Taxation in response to the Commission's request for views on the matter of the right of examination of Federal income-tax returns by State and local officials as provided for in the Senate amendment to H. R. 6359:

WISCONSIN

I favor Senate amendment authorizing such examination of income-tax returns.—PHILIP F. LA FOLLETTE, Governor, Madison.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL HOME-MORTGAGE RELIEF

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6021) to provide additional home-mortgage relief, to amend the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, and the National Housing Act, and for other purposes.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Being a member of the subcommittee which considered this bill, I am frank to say that the language we have been discussing troubles me somewhat. In the House bill the language is this:

In order to provide for applications heretofore filed—

Then, there is a semicolon, which separates the two classes to themselves—and for applicants who in good faith prior to the date this amendment takes effect, sought relief by formal application, letter, or otherwise, who file their applications within 60 days after this amendment takes effect.

So that there is no question that the 60-day provision is limited to those who have simply filed letters and memoranda or telegrams; but the change of punctuation in the amendment which we have reported, I am afraid, puts the applications heretofore filed, together with informal letters and memoranda, all on the same basis, because the semicolon is changed to a comma, and the word "and" is stricken out, so that it reads:

In order to provide for applications heretofore filed, for applicants who in good faith prior to the date this amendment takes effect, sought relief by formal application, letter, or otherwise, and who filed their applications within 60 days after this amendment takes effect.

That seems to me to put the old applications and the memoranda all on the same basis so as to require the refiling—at least it is open to the construction of requiring the refiling—by those who have already filed formal applications. I believe that the semicolon ought to be restored and the word "and" put in.

Mr. BULKLEY. I quite agree with the Senator, and I hope that the semicolon may be restored at the proper time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEWIS in the chair). Will the Senator from Kentucky, with the indulgence of the Senator from Ohio, permit the present occupant of the chair to ask him to be so good as to repeat his suggestion? The present occupant of the chair was not able to hear it, and he is very much interested in the subject. What was the change which the Senator from Kentucky suggested in the language of the bill?

Mr. BARKLEY. The sugggestion I made was that the amendment which we have reported strikes out the semicolon, which changes the meaning of the sentence so as possibly to make the 60-day provision apply to applications already formally filed and now under consideration; and I suggest the restoration of the punctuation so as to set aside in one group all applications which have heretofore been formally filed and make the 60-day provision apply only to informal memoranda and letters looking to the filing of applications but not followed up by the actual formal filing of the application.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair thanks the Senator from Kentucky; he is very much interested in that phase of the bill.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, the operations of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation were greatly expedited by the guarantee by the Government of the principal as well as the interest on its bonds in the early part of 1934, and by the summer of that year the Corporation was refunding the debts against as many as 20,000 homes per week, involving a total refunding of as much as $60,000,000 per week, and these operations continue at the rate of many thousands of loans each week, involving many millions of dollars. The applications now on hand have been in the main considered, and loans can be closed rapidly with the additional resources provided in this bill, so that within a few months the relief to be extended by the Corporation should be substantially completed. When this task is done the Corporation expects to hold more than 1,000,000 loans on individual homes scattered throughout the United States, including the District of Columbia, Alaska, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico. These loans will average about $3,000 each, and provide for a monthly payment which pays all interest and some principal each month in an average amount of about $24 per month, and these payments are payable over a period of 180 months.

The loan procedure of the Corporation involves the refinancing of the debt of the applicant in a new mortgage payable in monthly installments over 15 years, and the delivery to the mortgagee or mortgagees or other lienholders of the bonds of the Corporation at face value in settlement of their claims, and the payment of taxes, assessments, and incidental cost of the transaction in cash. As of July 1, 1933, the Corporation authorized the issuance of 18-year 4-percent bonds guaranteed by the United States as to interest only, callable at any interest-payment date after 30 days' published notice, and prior to the act of April 27, 1934, which authorized the Corporation to issue bonds bearing 4-percent interest, guaranteed as to principal, $635,361,150 of which had been issued or committed.

As of November 27, 1934, approximately half of said 4-percent bonds had been refunded by the issuance of 3-percent 18-year fully guaranteed bonds. The Corporation, after April 27, 1934, began the issuance of 3-percent 18-year fully guaranteed bonds for refunding outstanding 4-percent bonds, for exchange for mortgages and other liens, and for sale. Since the 27th day of July 1934 the Corporation has issued 2¾-percent 15-year fully guaranteed bonds for exchange for mortgages and other liens. In order to provide cash in addition to the capital funds of the Corporation necessary for the expenses of organization and operation, and for cash loans and for cash advances for taxes, assessments, incidental costs, repairs, and improvements, a total of $87,121,900 of said 3-percent bonds have been sold, and in addition there was authorized, issued, and sold $49,736,000 of 1½-percent 2-year bonds, $49,843,000 of 1¾-percent 3-year bonds, and $49,532,100 of 2-percent 4-year bonds.

After deduction of $10,628,200 of bonds retired out of payments from borrowers on principal account, the Corporation had outstanding on April 8, 1935, bonds in the total sum of $2,549,823,425.

If there be no objection, I should like to extend in the RECORD a break-down of that total, showing the different series of bonds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, after payment of organization and operating costs through December 31, 1934, the Corporation had a deficit of $10,384,859.91 as is shown by its annual report to Congress. The Corporation has experienced a heavy expense in the quick acquisition of so many loans, and it is too early to determine with any reasonable degree of accuracy its operating cost after its task of acquisition of loans is completed. We may reasonably hope that, after the payment of normal operating costs, a substantial interest income will accrue to extinguish the existing deficit, and to provide for offsetting substantial losses.

To provide for anticipated losses the Corporation has passed to a reserve for losses on loans a sum equivalent to one-fourth of 1 percent per annum of the outstanding balances on loans, in the sum of $5,276,200.70, and has provided a reserve for liability insurance of $100,000, which, of course, resulted in increasing the deficit referred to above by that amount. More than half the deficit was due to the setting up of these reserves. On the other hand, attention should be called to the fact that the financial statement here referred to as of December 31, 1934, which appears in the annual report, includes accrued interest on loans whether such interest was collected or not, and the total of such accrued interest is reported to have amounted on December 31, 1934, to $63,931,132.26. When a reserve is provided for delinquent interest, of course, the deficit will be increased accordingly. The Corporation has followed the practice of charging all its organization and operating costs to expense and not capitalizing any of it. It is clear, therefore, that a very large expenditure was incurred in organization and in work on loan applications and in operation before any substantial interest income began to accrue. It is clear also that there is an initial cost involved in acquiring loans, and all of this cost has been carried into operating expenses, whereas some of it might very well have been amortized over a period of years and thus the current deficit would have been decreased. When the acquisition of loans is completed, many of the heaviest expenses of the Corporation will be discontinued, and at that time the Corporation will have its maximum volume of loans and, therefore, its maximum interest income.

It appears that the Corporation has developed an effective process for the investigation of applications and the applicants and the security, and for the closing of loans. Earnest efforts appear to have been made to develop the procedure for servicing these loans, including the collection of loan payments, but much remains to be done in this direction.

The Corporation maintains its principal office in Washington for the executive direction of the Corporation, and maintains 11 regional offices at strategic points throughout the United States at which the principal loan records are kept, and from which certain supervision is maintained. There is a State office in each State and more than 300 district offices at the points of principal concentration of loans. These State and district offices have not only had the principal responsibility for the making of loans but also must be maintained for the servicing of the loans and the collection of delinquent loan payments.

Many difficulties have been confronted in the administration of the Corporation, including the problem of securing satisfactory personnel, the problem of determining properly eligible applicants and security as provided by the statute, and, of course, many problems will be met in providing for adequate servicing of these loans and the collection of payments. It is believed that the efficient administration of the Corporation will be possible under the law as it is proposed to amend it by this bill.

The other agencies of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, namely, the Federal Home Loan Bank System, the Federal Savings and Loan System, and the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation are intended to stabilize and promote normal mortgage lending on a sound and economical basis, and all of these agencies are affected more or less by amendments incorporated in this bill.

The Federal Home Loan Bank System was establishd by the act of July 22, 1932. On December 31, 1933, it had 2,086 member institutions, and it is estimated that these institutions held more than $1,500,000,000 of home mortgages. On March 30, 1935, the system had 3,203 member institutions, and it is estimated that they hold nearly $3,000,000,000 of home mortgages. Nearly all of these member institutions are local building and loan associations although there are a few mutual savings banks which are members, and a few insurance company members. The 12 home-loan banks provide long-term credit for these mortgage institutions as well as necessary short-term credit and are intended not only to stabilize the local institutions and make them better able to serve their savers who provide the funds for their financing of homes, but also, by the extension of long-term credit, to provide a larger volume of money to accommodate home owners over a longer term, so that home-mortgage debts may be paid off in monthly installments out of family income. It is reported that out of this large number of members, which are entrusted with several billion dollars of the savings of the people and which hold so large a volume of the home mortgages of the country, only 6 are in receivership and only 6 others are in any kind of public custody or control.

The home-loan banks have made, up to March 30, 1935, 6,007 loans to member institutions for a total of $139,038,-261.50, of which $66,206,909.29 has been repaid, and $72,831,352.21 remains outstanding. Member institutions have an established line of credit with the home-loan banks of several hundred million dollars which is available for these local member institutions for mortgage lending. The operation of these banks is expected not only to bring about better practices for the benefit of home owners, but also to provide stability and to provide large additional funds for home building.

It is believed that the proposed amendments of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act in this bill will contribute to a more wholesome development of the system.

The Federal Savings and Loan System was authorized in sections 5 and 6 of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, and provision was there made for the Federal Home Loan Bank Board to charter, organize, examine, and supervise these associations in territory not adequately served by local thrift and home-financing institutions. Fifty million dollars has been appropriated for the purchase of shares by the United States in these associations, to encourage their development and to provide funds locally along with local savings for the financing of homes.

Up to March 31, 1935, 527 new charters had been granted, and 225 State chartered institutions had been converted into Federal Savings and Loan Associations, making a total of 752 such associations, which were reported to have $212,-849,536 in assets. On the same date, the Secretary of the Treasury had paid $19,843,500 for shares in these associations. It will be seen that the investment of the Secretary of the Treasury in the aggregate is less than 10 percent of the total investment, although the statute authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to invest in the associations up to 75 percent of their total outstanding shares.

It is reported, in addition, that there are 4 applications pending for new charters and 313 applications pending to convert from a State charter to a Federal charter. Testimony before the committee indicated that the new Federal savings and loan associations are engaged in making long-term monthly amortized loans; that the new associations have increased their net mortgage holdings more than 15 percent each month for the past several months; and that the converted associations were also receiving a substantial flow of new savings, and in nearly all cases are actively engaged in financing homes. The pending bill provides for the continuation of this program.

Title IV of the National Housing Act, approved June 27, 1934, created the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation and required it to insure accounts in Federal savings and loan associations up to $5,000 and authorized it to insure, upon application, accounts in building and loan associations and similar institutions operating under State charter. On March 31, 1935, the Insurance Corporation had received 904 applications from institutions for the insurance of their accounts, which institutions had share and creditor liability of $465,890,839 and assets of $517,136,847. Examinations had been completed and 693 institutions insured on that date for an annual premium of a total of $587,770. Evidence before the committee indicated that this form of insurance of the savings accounts in these institutions is contributing substantially to confidence and is providing not only protection to the small savers in these institutions, but also is inviting a substantial flow of money into these institutions to provide more adequate capital for the long-term financing of homes.

The operation of this insurance fund is intended not only to stimulate confidence and provide more adequate capital, but also to attract funds at lower rates, to provide mortgage money for home owners at lower rates, and to provide such funds on a more stable basis, so that home owners may be more adequately financed over suitable terms, and thus may pay their home-mortgage debts from the family income. Adjustments are being made in this program by the pending bill which are calculated to facilitate the operation of the Insurance Corporation and to contribute substantially to recovery and normal operation of business in this field.

The Federal Housing Administration was created by the National Housing Act, approved June 27, 1934. Title I of that act provided for the insurance of modernization loans for the purpose of financing alterations, repairs, and improvements upon real property, the amount of each insured loan being limited to $2,000 and the Housing Administration insurance being limited to 20 percent of the amount of such loans made by each insured lender. Up to the sixth of April, 123,149 of such modernization loans have been insured, the total amount of such loans being $51,854,986. Arrangements have been made for the acceptance of such insurance contracts by 13,098 lending institutions with resources of nearly $45,000,000,000. The number of these institutions actually reporting insurance loans is 4,669.

It has been estimated, with some care, by the Housing Administration, though the estimate may be open to some doubt, that 750,000 men have been put to work as a result of the operations of title I of the National Housing Act.

Under title II of the National Housing Act, providing for the insurance by the Housing Administrator of mortgages on homes, 4,337 applications have been received up to April 6, in the total amount of $18,444,608. Commitments have been issued to the number of 1,889 for the aggregate amount of $8,385,513, and the number of applications still under consideration is 1,868, aggregating $7,856,666.

Title II also provides for the insurance of low-cost housing projects, and under this heading 65 applications have been received in the aggregate amount of $192,969,018, and of these tentative approval has been given to 6 projects aggregating $9,283,678.

No national mortgage associations have yet been formed pursuant to title III of the act. It is believed that with the modification of that title, which is carried by the bill now pending, it will be possible to secure the incorporation of at least a few of these national mortgage companies.

The bill, as presented to the Senate, has for its main purpose the increase of available credit to the Home Owners' Loan Corporation; and the section which we have already discussed at some length today is by all odds the most important section of the bill. Most of the other 28 sections of the bill deal with technical corrections. All of them have some value, but none is of any interest comparable to the interest in section 11, which has been discussed.

Section 4 provides for a Federal savings and loan advisory council, and gives to the home-loan banks a representation on the Federal advisory council which they have not heretofore had.

Section 21 liberalizes the provisions respecting the building up of reserves by Federal savings and loan associations, and gives them 20 years instead of 10 years to build up the required reserves.

Section 23 reduces the premiums which may be charged to member institutions for insurance in the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation.

The other provisions of the bill are so fully outlined in the committee report that I do not feel justified in taking the time of the Senate to explain the bill, section by section. I understand there are several Senators who wish to offer amendments to the bill; and in order that adequate opportunity may be had, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the committee has reported only a single amendment to the whole bill, to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert a redrafted bill, so any amendments must necessarily be offered to the committee amendment.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia to the amendment reported by the committee will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the committee amendment on page 24, between lines 13 and 14, it is proposed to insert the following new section:

SEC. 12. Subsection (j) of section 4 of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, as amended, is amended, effective 90 days after the date of enactment of this act, by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence:

"No person shall be appointed or retained as an officer, employee, agent, or attorney at a fixed salary in any regional or State office of the Corporation who is an officer or director of any firm, corporation, or association engaged in lending money on real estate."

It is also proposed to renumber the sections.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I regard it as being a very well settled principle that no public servant should also represent a private interest dealing with the Government agency by which he is employed. This amendment is designed to prevent an officer or director of a company lending money upon real estate from occupying a position in the Home Owners' Loan Corporation where he would be clothed with authority to pass upon the loans that are made by that organization.

The Secretary of the Treasury is required to divest himself of all his banking interests before he is eligible for appointment and confirmation to that office. No one would think of permitting the president of a railroad to serve on the Interstate Commerce Commission; yet there are instances where those who have fiduciary relations with enormous lending agencies lending money on real estate are serving in important positions in the Home Owners' Loan Corporation.

There is an additional reason why this practice should not be longer permitted. The representative of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation is not only a representative of the Government of the United States, and ostensibly devoted to seeing that the Government does not acquire a great many bad loans in taking over all these mortgages, but he is the trustee for the borrower. It is his duty, in connection with the loans which the borrower makes, whereby the holder of the mortgage takes over Government bonds that are absolutely the safest security on earth in lieu of a mortgage on real estate, to see that the borrower, when his papers have run all of the course through the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, does not owe more than the actual value of the property on which he is borrowing. In other words, if John Jones has given a mortgage for $5,000 to some private mortgage company, and he desires to refinance that mortgage with the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, and his property is worth only $3,000, the private mortgage company should not obtain bonds in an amount greater than $3,000, because that is all they could get if they took over the man's property.

I do not charge that there has been any malfeasance. I do not think it necessary to establish any specific bad practices. As a matter of sound public policy, those who administer this act should not be dealing with themselves as representatives of banks or mortgage corporations or building and loan associations that are transferring their paper wholesale to the Government agency. Stock in building and loan associations today should be the best stock on earth. Thirty-five percent of the total loans that have been made by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation have been for the purpose of taking up the loans made by such associations.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia whether his amendment would prevent service on the Board, not of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation but on the home-loan boards of the regional banks?

Mr. RUSSELL. As I construe the amendment, it would relate only to the Home Owners' Loan Corporation; those engaged in taking over mortgages of distressed property owners.

Mr. CONNALLY. What I have in mind is that the governing boards of these regional banks have on them a number of men who are officers in building-and-loan associations. They themselves do not make any direct loans, but they do supervise the local home-loan banks, who rediscount paper.

Mr. RUSSELL. I will say very frankly to the Senator from Texas that, in my opinion, the same rule should apply in both cases, but, as a matter of fact, the provisions of the amendment do not go that far, and it applies only to the officers and employees of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I gladly yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator understands, of course, that the home-loan banks, being separated entirely from the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, have no relationship whatever to it, except that the same board here in Washington operates both prongs of this double-barrelled institution. But the law requires that the stockholders of the home-loan banks shall be lending agencies, building associations, and others making up the home-loan banks. So it might be an injustice to require that anybody who served on a board of a home-loan bank, whose component parts are building and loan associations, could not do so because of his interest in a lending institution. There is no connection between the two at all.

Mr. RUSSELL. I appreciate the fact stated by the Senator from Kentucky. The amendment reads:

> That no person shall be appointed or retained as an officer, employee, agent, or attorney at a fixed salary in any regional or State office of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, who is an officer or director of any firm, corporation, or association engaged in lending money on real estate.

It would not apply to the circumstances related by the Senator from Kentucky. I cannot see how there could be any possible valid objection to the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. The words "at a fixed salary" would apply only to officers or employees?

Mr. RUSSELL. They would apply to all—officers, agents, and attorneys.

Mr. WALSH. The Home Owners' Loan Corporation employs a good many appraisers at fixed fees to appraise particular parcels of property where applications are made for loans. Would not the Senator's amendment prevent a person who himself had a mortgage on some other property being connected with the Home Owners' Loan Bank as an employee?

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not so construe the amendment. I particularly charged the legislative counsel to so draft the amendment that it would not affect a case such as that outlined by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Let us take another case. Suppose in a small community the chief and only appraisers are officers of what is known in my State as a cooperative bank but is known in other States as a home-building association. Such associations lend money on real estate. Would not the Senator's amendment prevent one of the officers of such an institution being employed to appraise property for the Home Owners' Loan Corporation?

Mr. RUSSELL. It would not. The amendment provides that "no person shall be appointed or retained as an officer, employee, agent, or attorney at a fixed salary in any regional or State office of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation." Unless he is receiving a fixed salary, he would not be barred.

Mr. WALSH. The provision as to a fixed salary, I understood the Senator to say, applies to others than attorneys.

Mr. RUSSELL. It applies to all of them.

Mr. WALSH. The fixed-salary provision, then, applies to officers and employees?

Mr. RUSSELL. Officers, employees, agents, and attorneys.

Mr. WALSH. So anybody employed per diem or employed to appraise a particular piece of property would not be subject to the terms of the proposed amendment?

Mr. RUSSELL. He would not be.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator's amendment, therefore, simply seeks to prevent any permanent employee or permanent officer or permanent attorney being engaged in the business of lending money on real estate?

Mr. RUSSELL. It only attempts to establish the policy that no officer of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation should occupy a dual relation, to serve as such officer or employee and at the same time be an officer or director of a corporation that is lending money on real estate and transferring its doubtful mortgages to the Home Owners' Loan Corporation.

Mr. WALSH. It occurred to me, in reading the amendment casually, that the provision "at a fixed salary" applied only to attorneys, and not to the officers or employees.

Mr. RUSSELL. It applies to all the agents, officers, employees, and attorneys.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me again?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand it applies only to regional offices and State offices.

Mr. RUSSELL. It does.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is, to the headquarters of the region or the headquarters of the State. It does not apply to district offices, established within the boundaries of a State, where there is a district manager and a district appraiser and a district attorney. Is that correct?

Mr. RUSSELL. It is limited to regional and State offices. Frankly, I am of opinion that it should apply to district and all other offices, but I did not seek so to extend it at this time.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I suggest that the amendment be amended to provide "or branch offices of State or district offices", because the officers managing a branch are the ones who originally pass upon an application and fix the appraisement, and then make a recommendation that a loan be approved or disapproved. While, of course, it is rechecked at the State headquarters, the initial action on the part of the branch office has a great influence when the matter is passed on by the State headquarters. I think it should include also the branch State offices.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, of course final action on these loans is to all intents and purposes taken in the State offices, and in my judgment the amendment would go a long way toward preventing what might be a very unsavory situation in regard to these loans from developing at a future date. I have no objection, however, to the suggested modification.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I move that the amendment be amended by adding the words "or branch State offices or district offices."

Mr. WALSH. Does not the Senator think that the language "Home Owners' Loan Corporation" includes branch offices?

Mr. TRAMMELL. It does not so state. It defines it by referring to regional or other State offices.

Mr. WALSH. An employee of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation is an employee, whether he is in a branch office in a State or in the home office here in Washington.

Mr. RUSSELL. In my judgment, this language would apply to anyone engaged in what might be called a branch agency, if such person were an employee of the State office of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to have that matter taken care of. I think the amendment is a very desirable one, and I am glad the Senator has offered it. It is unfortunate, in my opinion, that the original law did not contain such a provision.

Whether true or not true, I have heard it repeatedly stated that these agencies are largely controlled by people who have an interest in building-and-loan companies and have mortgages of their own which they want to unload, and that as a rule they get preference. The amendment, I think, is very timely under the circumstances and conditions. The only thing is that I would go so far as to say that no such persons as those enumerated shall be stockholders in one of these companies. There are plenty of capable, experienced men in the country who have no connection with these companies, who might allow prejudice in behalf of their own companies or favoritism to control them in filling all these positions. I desire to see these offices removed so far as possible from the possibility of being manipulated and handled by people who may have some selfish interest in view. Allow the average applicant for a loan to get a fair deal upon the merits of his application and not be pushed aside, as is done in many instances, so that some building-and-loan company, or some bank, which holds mortgages, may unload all its mortgages before the individual citizens have an opportunity to get relief. I could not establish by proof at this moment that that has been done, but I am confident, from what I have heard from time to time, that it has been done in a great many of these agencies, and we should try to check it.

I am heartily in favor of the amendment, though it is probably not so broad as I should like to see it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield to me again?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not like to interrupt the Senator so frequently, but I want to be sure just what the effect of the amendment would be.

I can see no objection to any provision of law which would prevent officers or agents of building-and-loan associations or other lending agencies which have mortgages on property that are distressed unloading on the Government. I have in mind, though, this kind of situation at a branch office: A man is employed as the district appraiser; that is, he supervises the appraisements which come in from the counties to the branch office. He is in the real-estate business, and is an expert real-estate man; he knows the value of real estate in the territory in which he serves. His main business is real estate, but as frequently happens in the sale of property, and in the negotiation of sales, it might be necessary to negotiate a loan on a piece of property in order to enable a person to buy. A real-estate agent frequently will act as a sort of go-between between the prospective purchaser and a bank, or some other institution which lends money.

The real-estate man whom I have in mind is not a lender; he is not employed by any insurance company or by any bank or by any building-and-loan association, but, as an incident to his real-estate business, he does help negotiate loans to purchasers upon property which they propose buying.

Mr. RUSSELL. Such a man would not be remotely affected by the amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Would it bar that sort of man being employed at an annual salary as an appraiser for a district?

Mr. RUSSELL. It would not affect him in any way, unless he was "an officer, employee, agent, or attorney at a fixed salary in any regional or State office of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation." A man and likewise an officer or director in a corporation lending on real estate in the situation outlined by the Senator from Kentucky would not be even remotely affected by the amendment.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BULKLEY. I desire to speak when the Senator from Georgia shall have concluded.

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield the floor.

Mr. BULKLEY. A provision similar to that offered by the Senator from Georgia was contained in the bill as it passed the House. In the hearings before our subcommittee officers of the Corporation appeared and testified very earnestly that the adoption of such a provision as this would seriously cripple the personnel at the State and regional offices. It should be made clear that by regulation no officer or employee is permitted to act, representing the Corporation, in any matter in which he may be interested on the other side. That is to say that if there are any dealings with any corporation or firm engaged in lending money on real estate in which he has any interest whatever he is prohibited from acting on that matter for the Corporation. I can well understand how the Senator from Georgia might think that was not quite an adequate limitation, and yet it is a practical one which is, I dare say, prevalent in the operation of most business concerns. The officers of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation tell us that many of their employees and officers are also directors, perhaps, of corporations lending on real estate. That the salaries offered by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation are not such as to justify them in severing their other connections, and perhaps in some instances they would not want to terminate connections of many years' standing, even if a higher salary were paid them by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation.

It has not been too easy for the Corporation to secure men adequately trained in the real-estate business, and I submit that the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia should not be agreed to because it will very seriously hamper the operations of the Corporation.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I cannot see how it can possibly hamper the operations of the Corporation. Surely enough men are available in this country to administer the Home Owners' Loan Act without the Corporation being required to go and get the officers and directors of building-and-loan associations and commercial banks to handle the loans.

In the testimony of the chairman of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board there was shown the distribution of this enormous bond issue which has been authorized by Congress, to assure the repayment of which the full faith and credit of the United States Government is pledged. It was shown that 35 percent of all the bonds which have been issued and loans that have been made by the Corporation has gone to building-and-loan associations; that 30 percent of those loans has gone to savings banks; that 13 percent has gone to commercial banks; and that less than 3 percent has gone to individual mortgagees.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. There is nothing suspicious about figures of that sort. We all know that the vast majority of loans on small homes in cities throughout the country which are being held, are held either by building-and-loan associations or by savings banks or other banks which make a specialty of lending money on real estate, and I dare say that the proportion of loans held on such small homes throughout the country by private individuals, if the total number of loans should be allocated to each particular group, would not be out of line with the proportion of refinancing which has gone on under the Home Owners' Loan Corporation Act.

Mr. RUSSELL. I did not intend to infer either directly or by innuendo that there had been any wrongdoing, but I am submitting that, as a matter of sound public policy, it is improper to have any individual representing the private interests and at the same time filling a position of public trust. While we might not have any occasion to doubt the integrity or the patriotism of the president of some huge banking institution of this country faithfully to serve as the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, certainly the Senate would not confirm him so long as he occupies that position.

It is not sound in principle or in public policy to have the officials of these private institutions representing themselves and their institutions while at the same time representing the Government which has pledged its faith and credit behind this enormous bond issue, and also representing the poor borrower who must sweat to repay those loans.

When we wrote the original Home Owners' Loan Act we specifically provided that in an effort to relieve the distress of the home owner he should not be compelled to issue a new mortgage for more than the value of his property. In that difference between inflated values of thousands of mortgages held on homes in this country and the real market value today, without there being any intentional wrongdoing on earth, a huge debt burden which should be wiped out can be left on the borrowers unless someone who considers himself to be the agent and the representative of the borrower and the Government alone handles these loans. I submit that there is not a sound reason on earth why the personnel of this agency should be crippled by this amendment. Let those who occupy this dual relation resign one or the other of their positions, so there can be no suspicion that any one has been unfair in this matter.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I wish respectfully to invite the Senator's attention to the amendment which he intends to propose, which reads as follows:

> No person shall be appointed or retained as an officer, employee, agent, or attorney at a fixed salary in any regional or State office of the Corporation who is an officer or director of any firm, corporation, or association engaged in lending money on real estate.

If this amendment is to be adopted, I think it ought to go a great deal further; otherwise, it will work a great hardship upon the Home Owners' Loan Corporation itself.

Let us assume that an individual from the State of Kentucky, who is an officer of a building-and-loan association engaged in lending money upon real estate in Kentucky, has been so fortunate as to secure a position with the Home Owners' Loan Corporation at the regional office in Atlanta, Ga. According to the interpretation which has just been placed on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, the assumed Kentuckian who is an officer of a corporation in Kentucky could not hold a position with the Home Owners' Loan Corporation in the State of Georgia.

If the Senator from Georgia would go further and provide in his amendment that no officer of any lending corporation lending money upon real estate shall be connected with the Home Owners' Loan Corporation in the region wherein he is a member of the Corporation, I think it should be accepted; but, according to the language of the Senator's amendment, a man from Illinois who is an officer in a lending corporation there, and who goes to Atlanta, Ga., where he is employed by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, could not hold the latter position.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. A great many of us are opposed to having officials appointed from North Carolina and sent out to Missouri, for instance. Every one recognizes the great facility of the Senator from North Carolina in securing employment for his constituents; but section 11 of the House bill was designed to prevent the very practice of sending employees and agents and lawyers and officers from North Carolina, for instance, to administer the regional offices in Missouri. It seems to me the amendment of the Senator from Georgia very properly does not make the exceptions suggested by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. REYNOLDS. The amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia does not deal with the specific subject which the Senator from Missouri has mentioned. The Senator from Missouri is talking about another section of the bill, which was stricken out in the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate. The Senator is talking about something which is not before the Senate at the present time.

If the Senator from Missouri will pardon me, the Senator from Georgia has offered an amendment prohibiting any officer of a building-and-loan association from being an officer or an employee of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, feeling as he does that such a man would be more thoroughly interested in his company, perhaps—I assume that is the intimation—than he would in the affairs of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I understand precisely what is before the Senate, but the Senator from North Carolina, as I understand, now comes back with an objection to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia and makes the observation that while it might be proper to have this limitation as to an officer of any corporation in North Carolina exercising such functions in North Carolina, if he moves over to the State of Georgia he ought to be permitted to function.

Mr. REYNOLDS. The point I make is that under the provisions of the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, if a man in Kentucky, as I explained, is an officer in a building-and-loan association there, this amendment would prohibit his serving with the Home Owners' Loan Corporation anywhere in the United States.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I realize that there might be some individual cases such as suggested by the Senator from North Carolina in which a hardship might be worked, but I am not concerned here with individuals. It is a well-recognized principle, as old as our Government itself, that no public official should in his public capacity deal with a private agency in which he has an interest. That is what this amendment seeks to secure. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Fundamentally I agree with the Senator. I do not believe that any man who has a real financial interest in any building-and-loan organization should be permitted to interest himself in the affairs of the Government insofar as the Home Owners' Loan Corporation is concerned in the community in which he has that private, personal, financial interest. But I wish to say, Mr. President, that in my opinion, if this amendment should be enacted as proposed by the Senator from Georgia in its present form, the probabilities are that it would work a hardship upon the officers of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation for this reason: I have no doubt that there are in many departments of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation men of experience who have financial interests in building-and-loan organizations, and because of their experience no doubt they are of great benefit to the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. To adopt this amendment——

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. REYNOLDS. In just a moment I will be glad to yield to the Senator from Kentucky. To adopt this amendment as proposed would probably take from the service of the Government many well-versed and experienced men who have, no doubt, rendered excellent service to the Corporation. I now yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inquire if the Senator from Georgia has yielded the floor?

Mr. RUSSELL. I have yielded the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina express himself as holding the floor?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then, does he yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is it not true that when the Home Owners' Loan Corporation was first set up it was necessary to search the country over in order to find experienced men who had knowledge of the business of making loans upon real estate and especially upon small homes?

Mr. REYNOLDS. That is unquestionably true.

Mr. BARKLEY. And that had to be done rather hastily. My experience has been that there has been no complaint on the part of the public that it has been too easy to refinance loans under the Home Owners' Loan Corporation.

Mr. REYNOLDS. The contrary has been true in many instances.

Mr. BARKLEY. The only complaints I have ever received have been to the effect that it has been too difficult for the applicant to receive the approval of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation of applications for the refinancing of loans. That has grown out of many things one of which was the decline in the value of real estate so that the appraisal at the present time of the home was not sufficiently high to take care of the mortgage which already existed.

Mr. REYNOLDS. That is true of mortgages which had been placed on properties prior to the depression.

Mr. BARKLEY. As a matter of fact, the bill we now have before us is in the nature of winding up the activities of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation insofar as loans are concerned. In this bill we limit the granting of loans to cases where applications have already been filed or to cases where memoranda or letters have been written looking toward the filing of a formal application, and in that case they must be filed in a formal way within 60 days after the passage of this proposed act. So it seems to me, if the Senator from North Carolina will yield further——

Mr. REYNOLDS. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. That an effort is now being made to bring about a situation where it may be necessary for the Home Owners' Loan Corporation to discharge or dismiss or relieve many of its experts, valuable men, who up to this time have performed valuable service, who have been honest and conscientious in undertaking to help enforce the law, and to do that at a time when we are providing only for winding up the remaining applications now on file which could not be acted upon because of the lack of funds, and that in all likelihood we will do more harm than good by the adoption of such an amendment as is now proposed.

I concede that, as a matter of theory, it is wise never to have anybody acting in a dual capacity, but the situation was peculiar and it is now peculiar, and if we shall adopt this amendment it will probably make it necessary for the Home Owners' Loan Corporation to dispense with the services of some of the best experts, of some of the most conscientious men, who have aided them in building up the organization under which this great refinancing operation has been carried on.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I thank the Senator from Kentucky for his valuable contribution, and I am in thorough accord with what he has said. It merely confirms the argument I was making relative to the injustices that might be done present employees of the Corporation.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I should like to ask the Senator if he does not think the general public should be entitled to some consideration in the matter of relief? If employees of private institutions have gotten in and honeycombed this system and have used it, in many instances, to favor companies they represent, I think the great general public, the individual who borrows money, is entitled to some consideration. I, myself, was astounded when I found that the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, when they went out into the field to select men to take charge of their offices in the States, for instance, picked out some who were vitally and very materially interested in some private loan company and made them the heads of the State organizations. If they have done that, should not Congress remedy the situation and place its stamp of disapproval upon turning the administration of the law over to a lot of money lenders, to people who themselves have mortgages which they wish to dispose of, instead of getting entirely disinterested people who would deal with the situation purely from an unprejudiced and unselfish standpoint? That is all I wish.

I think it is all a bugaboo to talk about the Government not being able to get efficient and capable agents to represent it except by going out and picking them from some private institution which is vitally interested. If they are not extremely honest and unusual men, on account of their environment or on account of their interest, they will perform their duty in the interest of their own companies first.

We have seen that happen in other matters. Times have progressed in this country very wonderfully during the last few years, and I am glad that has been so. At one time the railroad lawyer, who came to Congress on a pass, could get elected to the United States Senate. The lawmaking body said, first, "We will clip his wings by taking his passes away from him." That was done in my State.

Later on, the voice of the people throughout this country practically decreed that the man who would go into a public office, legislative or otherwise, and represent first his private interest should no longer be elected to public office. I am not in favor of allowing an appointive power to go contrary to that public conscience which exists in America today, certainly in most of the States. I do not think public officers should have any private interests. If this board has so far violated the proprieties of the situation, in view of a sentiment which I think is a wise and correct one among the American people, that interested people should not occupy these important positions, then I say Congress should drive them from those positions of importance, regardless of the fact that some man from North Carolina may hold a position in Missouri or some man from Kentucky may hold a position in Atlanta. The same environment, the same selfish interest that would induce a man in North Carolina at the head of a North Carolina association to show favoritism to some company in which he is interested will still be within that man's breast and within his mind, whether he is in Kentucky or in Missouri.

I am not criticising any particular individual; I am merely commenting upon the principle involved; and I say, drive from these positions those who have private interests which will be sure to becloud their judgment and their performance of public duty.

I am heartily in sympathy with the purpose of the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia. We will have to let the chips fall where they may, if some person happens to be in a position he should not be in on account of his private interest.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I might say to the Senator, in answer to his very able argument, that I am in thorough accord with the amendment proposed by the junior Senator from the State of Georgia insofar as it goes, but I wish to say further to the Senator that, in my opinion, the amendment does not go far enough; and I hope to impress my views upon my colleague from the State of Florida by making mention of a concrete example which I shall endeavor to cite. Let us suppose that a man from the Senator's State of Florida, living in Jacksonville, is an officer of a building-and-loan corporation there; he has been successful in securing a position with the Home Owners' Loan Corporation and has been stationed in Chicago, Ill. Does the Senator think, because that man of good character from the State of Florida and the city of Jacksonville, is an officer or stockholder, or interested financially in a building-and-loan corporation in Jacksonville, that he would be influenced selfishly in his duties in the city of Chicago, in the State of Illinois?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I am not referring to any particular personality, but I think, on account of the colored glasses he wears, on account of his environment and his interest, being in the money-lending business, that he probably would be much more favorable toward the loan companies and the insurance companies than would a person who did not have such an interest.

I wish to have the law administered by those who have no interests of such character. People cannot get away from their environment; they cannot get away from their interest. The average person connected with a building-and-loan association or a loan agency places that above everything else. His idea is that that is a proper institution to perpetuate.

Take this very bill we have before us; the building-and-loan companies and the mortgage-loan companies and probably the banks of the country have persuaded the committee that the thing to do is to wind up the activities of the Government in loaning money to individuals and turn them entirely over to the loan companies of the country. Therefore the bill contains an amendment—and I was surprised at the provision—that no one except those who already have applications on file and those who have written notes or have made memoranda in regard to a desire to make application for loans, shall have any right whatever to obtain a loan under this bill, the idea being, of course, to switch all of them over to the loan and mortgage companies.

Mr. REYNOLDS. If the Senator will yield there, I will say that I am under the impression that the Senator is in error in regard to that.

Mr. TRAMMELL. No; I am not in error; the bill specifically so provides.

Mr. REYNOLDS. When the bill was originally drafted and presented——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. On that point, let me suggest that if the Senator is looking for the provision it is on page 23. I have an amendment, however, which I am going to offer which will modify that provision so that there will be 60 days' leeway for any application to be made.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Let me say in that regard——

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Florida will indulge me for just a moment, I will say that I am grateful to the Senator from Nebraska.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must remind Senators to please address the Chair if they desire to interrupt, so that the Chair may know which Senator is recognized and has the right to the floor.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, in answer to the statement made by the Senator from Florida, let me say that he was not properly advised as to the requirement for obtaining a loan out of the additional $1,750,000,000. As the bill was originally drafted, it was the intent of the drafters thereof not to permit anyone to participate in the additional $1,750,000,000 who had not prior thereto written a letter or filed an application for participation in the new money. But recognizing, as I did, that that would work an injustice on many worthy home owners in the country who were in distress, I appeared before the Subcommittee on Banking and Currency, presided over by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY], and there made a recommendation in line with the statement made by the Senator from Nebraska, urging at that time that anyone who should have filed an application 60 days after the passage of the bill should be given the same opportunity for participating in the fund as had been given those who had filed applications prior to the exhaustion of the original $2,000,000,000.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The Senator and I are entirely in accord on that point, but unfortunately on page 23 of the bill, section 11, subsection (c), it will be seen that the privilege is limited to those applications which were filed previously or to the applicants who had previously made inquiry in regard to loans, and does not permit anyone else to file an application. That is the reason why I raised the question. We are thoroughly in accord on the proposition, but unfortunately the committee did not adopt the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I made that suggestion to the committee, and I am very happy, indeed, to know that the Senator from Nebraska has in mind offering an amendment to take care of worthy individuals who probably will want to make application for relief under the new appropriation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. I have been very much impressed with the argument which has been presented in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Georgia based upon the principle that a public officer should not be situated so that private interests might possibly affect his judgment. I think it is a sound principle. I wonder if the Senator from Georgia would accept an amendment to his amendment providing "That no Senator, Representative, or Delegate in Congress, after his election and during his continuance in office, shall act as attorney or counsel for any person, corporation, or association engaged in interstate commerce"?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I fear if I were to accept the amendment suggested by the Senator from Idaho it might decrease the chances of adoption of the amendment as it is now written. Therefore, I prefer not to accept it.

Mr. BORAH. It is upon the same principle exactly as the Senator's amendment.

Mr. RUSSELL. I concede it to be, but it is not exactly germane to the subject matter before us.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, why not go further and provide that no one elected to the United States Senate shall retain any property he ever owned or acquire any more property so long as he remains in the Senate, because his property might be indirectly affected by some legislation which should be enacted by his vote?

Mr. BORAH. I do not think the Senator from Kentucky is serious in his analogy.

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, yes, I am; just as serious as the Senator is in his suggestion.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator is serious, then his application needs revision, as he will appreciate after he has more time to reflect on it. I am simply proposing a rule which has been applied in all other instances by the Senate, over and over again, that there shall not be any conflict of interests between a public official and his private interests. If we are going to apply the rule to private individuals and to business, shall we hesitate to apply it to ourselves? I, of course, cannot offer the amendment, as it would be in the third degree. I appreciate that the Senator from Georgia does not want to imperil his amendment.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, in pursuance of the matter which we recently had under discussion, and in particular answer to the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], I desire to make a statement. I have been informed that prior to the exhaustion of the $2,000,000,000 originally appropriated for use to relieve distressed home owners in the country additional applications for more than $1,000,000,000 had been filed with various offices of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation throughout the United States. In view of the fact that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] will offer an amendment providing that others may have an opportunity to file their respective applications, I am of the opinion that the greater majority of those applications filed prior to the exhaustion of the fund will no doubt be given preference in consideration and be first given favorable consideration. That being the case, the Home Owners' Loan Corporation will not be called upon to do as much work as formerly it had to do for the reason that it already has applications sufficient to absorb the additional $1,750,000,000 of funds without considering any more applications. The amendment to be offered by the Senator from Nebraska, which is a good one and one for which I shall vote, would contemplate additional applications.

I desire to say in conclusion that, so far as the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] goes, I am in accord with it; I am in favor of it; I am in agreement with him; but I do not believe the amendment goes far enough. I think some injustices would be done, and the Corporation in many instances would be injured. I hope the Senator from Georgia will add to his amendment a provision so that it shall not affect the present employees of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation who are not officers of building-and-loan associations within the confines of the district in which they are now working as employees of the Government.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina appreciates the difficulties which we encounter when the Senate undertakes to deviate from sound general principles to provide for individual cases. I cannot accept the suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina. I believe it would be inadvisable to do so.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, before we vote on the pending amendment, I desire to read briefly what was reported to the committee by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation:

> The last clause in reference to persons connected with mortgage institutions is objectionable because, in the opinion of the members of the Board, the Corporation needs employees who know the mortgage business, and has such employees throughout the country, and would be extremely handicapped if it were required that the Corporation be operated without such men, some of the best of whom would leave the service of the Corporation if this legislation is passed. The land operations of the Corporation will in a few months be completed, and no objection can be seen to the employees of the Corporation serving as directors, or in some other capacities of Federal savings and loan associations and similar institutions. The Corporation has at all times by regulation prohibited any of its employees interested in any way in any mortgage institution from passing upon mortgages in which the institution was interested.

So far as specific cases are concerned, the regulation of the Corporation goes much further than the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL]. It applies to all employees, including those employed in district offices. It applies also to all transactions.

Let me read briefly from what Mr. Fahey said before the committee:

> As I have already stated, any employees of that class are in no position in any way to influence loan applications which affect institutions with which they may be connected. We have in the employees of the Corporation a very substantial number of men of long experience in banking and in the mortgage business who may be directors of certain savings and loan associations or of banks or even of mortgage corporations of one sort or another, or insurance corporations.
> Senator STEIWER. Well, are not those men among your more valuable employees?
> Mr. FAHEY. Most valuable people we have, Senator, and the suggestion that their presence in the organization means that they can promote selfish interests is quite unwarranted, because the Corporation from the beginning has thrown all sorts of safeguards around that. Besides that, the Corporation would not knowingly employ men of that character, anyway.
> Now, we have in the employ of the Corporation a considerable number of business men of long financial experience and knowledge of the mortgage business, who are interested in this particular work to a very considerable extent, not from the standpoint of salary but from the standpoint of public service. We have many men in this work who would not undertake the same kind of work in private employment at the compensation that we are able to offer them. It would be a very serious loss to the Corporation to be obliged to dispense with the services of men of that sort, and a reflection on their character and integrity is wholly unwarranted.

I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that no specific instance is mentioned where any damage has happened to the Corporation or to the public as a result of the officers and employees being employed on the present basis. The objection is entirely a theoretical one, but the argument of the Chairman of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation is an exceedingly practical one.

I hope the amendment will be rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] to the amendment of the committee. (Putting the question:) According to the response, the Chair is somewhat in doubt.

Mr. RUSSELL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may the amendment be stated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request is that the amendment may be stated. There being no objection, it will be stated, pending the roll call.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 24, between lines 13 and 14, it is proposed to insert the following new section:

> SEC. 12. Subsection (j) of section 4 of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, as amended, is amended, effective 90 days after the date of enactment of this act, by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence:
> "No person shall be appointed or retained as an officer, employee, agent, or attorney at a fixed salary in any regional or State office of the Corporation who is an officer or director of any firm, corporation, or association engaged in lending money on real estate."

It is also proposed to renumber the sections.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll call will proceed.

The legislative clerk resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. CUTTING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. TYDINGS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. McKELLAR (after having voted in the negative). I understand that my pair, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND], is not present. I transfer my pair with him to the junior Senator from California [Mr. McADOO], and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. LOGAN. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], who is absent. I transfer that pair to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire to announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BILBO], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY], the Senator from California [Mr. McADOO], the Senator from Indiana

[Mr. MINTON], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE] are unavoidably detained from the Senate.

I also announce that my colleague the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY] is detained from the Senate by illness.

Mr. AUSTIN. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR], has a general pair with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD].

The Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE] has a general pair with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN].

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] has a general pair with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE].

These Senators are necessarily detained. I am not advised how any of them would vote on this question.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] is absent on account of illness. I am not informed how he would vote on this question.

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] is necessarily absent.

So Mr. RUSSELL'S amendment to the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator in charge of the bill a question. As I understand, the number of directors has been reduced from the number provided under the present arrangement regarding local representation.

Mr. BULKLEY. The committee has reported an amendment to the existing law providing for a reduction in the number of directors of each home-loan bank from 11 to 9. Of the 11 directors under existing law, 9 are elected by the member banks, and 2 are appointed as public-interest directors by the Home Loan Bank Board. The amendment proposed by the committee provides for having 6 elected by the member banks, and 3 appointed as public-interest directors by the Home Loan Bank Board.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me to offer an amendment on that subject?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. I move to amend the committee amendment by striking out section 3.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina submits an amendment which the clerk will state.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the committee amendment, on page 17, after line 14, it is proposed to strike out section 3, as follows:

SEC. 3. Subsections (a), (b), and (c) of section 7 of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, as amended, are amended, effective January 1, 1936, to read as follows:

"(a) The management of each Federal home-loan bank shall be vested in a board of nine directors, all of whom shall be citizens of the United States and bona fide residents of the district in which such bank is located.

"(b) Three of such directors shall be appointed by the Board and shall hold office for terms of 3 years; except that the terms of office of the two such directors heretofore appointed shall expire at the end of the calendar years 1936 and 1937, respectively, and the term of office of the first such director hereafter appointed shall expire at the end of the calendar year 1938.

"(c) Six of such directors, two of whom shall be known as class A directors, two of whom shall be known as class B directors, and two of whom shall be known as class C directors, shall be elected as provided in subsection (d), and shall hold office for terms of 2 years; except that the terms of office of the directors heretofore elected to serve until the end of the calendar years 1936 and 1937, respectively, shall expire at the end of such calendar years."

Mr. BYRNES. I ask the Senator from New York to yield to me to make a statement about the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. I make the motion for this reason: As the Senator from Ohio has stated, there are upon the Board 11 members, 2 representing the public interest, appointed by the Board in Washington, 9 being elected by members of the local boards.

The proposal of the Board is to reduce the number to 9 and to provide that 3 of the 9 shall be appointed by the Board and 6 be elected by the local members. The effect would be to increase the number of members appointed by the Board from 2 to 3, and to reduce the number elected by the local members from 9 to 6.

The purpose of the board, as I gather it from the testimony of Mr. Fahey, is twofold. They state that, because the Government has approximately 80 percent of the funds in the institution, it should have a greater representation upon the board; and, in the second place, their assertion is that the building and loan associations were among the first to become members of the organization, and therefore they have a greater interest in the board than possibly is wise.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me to ask the Senator from South Carolina a question?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Is not another effect of the committee amendment, as drawn at present, automatically to legislate out of office one whole class of directors now in office, and might it not well be that the class legislated out of office by law automatically might be composed of very able and the most experienced and most desirable members who are now on the board of directors?

Mr. BYRNES. The Senator from Missouri has stated the case exactly as I see it, because under the terms of the amendment the directors whose terms expire this year are to all intents and purposes legislated out of office. There are 11 members at this time. The three whose terms expire this year may be the most efficient and the ablest members on the board, but by the provision now in the bill they would be legislated from the board.

If that is to be done, it seems to me it would be better if the members of the organization had the power to determine which of the nine directors should remain on the board. They have no such power. By the pending legislation the three whose terms expire this year will no longer serve upon the board.

As I understand, this proposal was submitted to the House of Representatives, and the House did not include it in the bill. The Senate committee has included it.

The testimony shows that the Senator from Ohio inquired as to the reason for it. Among other things, Mr. Fahey said this:

Of course, the safe conduct of these institutions and the extent to which they are being managed in the public interest depends upon the local supervision to a very large extent. The experience with them thus far has been highly successful. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. President, if the Chairman of the Board says that the experience with the Board as now constituted has been highly successful, and that there is no doubt about it, then I submit that there is no reason for changing a situation which, in the opinion of the Chairman of the Board, has been highly successful and as to the success of which he has no doubt.

I think we are asked to do something which would be unnecessary. No complaint is made. We have no urging from anybody that the public interest is being neglected or disregarded. The statement by the Chairman of the Board is solely that he believes, taking into consideration the large holding of stock by the Government, that it would be wiser to increase its representation.

If we should take such action, we would run the risk of demoralizing the local situations? Nine directors are provided for, and it is necessary to get rid of three of them, with no charge that they have been neglectful, and if the membership shall be reduced as provided it will be reduced by legislation, and not by the exercise of discretion on the part of those who are interested in the organization.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. In other words, we would not give the electors a chance to make a selection of the directors they would retain. Congress, by virtue of its power, would make a selection for them.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, that is one of my chief objections. If it is determined that for some reason there must be a change in the organization, if the stockholders are to be told that they cannot have nine directors, I think the language ought to be so changed as that the stockholders would be permitted to say who would remain. But under this language, because those whose terms expire this year are not eligible for reelection, their places having been abolished, the only members of the board will be those whose terms will expire next year and the year succeeding.

If there were any great or important reason presented showing the necessity for this proposed action, I might be disposed to think Mr. Fahey was correct, but when he, himself, said that the experience with the present organization had been highly successful, I think it extremely unwise to make a change at this time.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I have listened with great interest to what the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] has said, and he has voiced the views I myself hold.

If we were initiating this plan, it would be all very well to do what is proposed, but, as a matter of fact, in the territory where I live it would mean that the three men who would be legislated out of office would be the three men from New York State, and there would be left only one man from New York State——

Mr. WAGNER. And I might say to my colleague that those three men have rendered an exceptional public service.

Mr. COPELAND. I agree with my colleague; they have rendered wonderful service.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I understand the Government investment in these banks is 80 percent. Am I correct?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. My information and observation have been somewhat different from the Senator's. I know of some instances where Government authorities have sought to make suggestions to the directors of these banks which were in the public interest, but they have not been followed.

I assume, from the action of the committee, that the officials of our Government have realized that having merely two directors out of 11 gave them a very meager influence in directing the policies and management of a bank where the Government's stake is 80 percent. I should like to know what other group of people in the world would put 80 percent of their money into a banking institution and allow themselves to be represented by 2 out of 11 directors in the management of the bank.

I know of instances where suggestions have been made in the public interest to change policies, which have been disregarded, and the Government, with its 80 percent of the funds in these banks, has been powerless, and has had to fold its arms and say nothing. The proposal here is to get a little more Government influence, and Government control, and Government management of 80 percent of the money in these banks, and I cannot see how anybody representing the Government can refuse to increase its representation on the boards.

It may be unfortunate that the text of the language in section 3 is such as to remove good members whose terms are expiring, but I wish to say, and I think the Senator from New York will agree with me, that we should not be satisfied with 2 out of 9 members when 80 percent of the money is the money of the Government, the people's money. We ought to be responsible for the management, and not leave it to private individuals. I assume that is the reason for the proposal.

Mr. ROBINSON. That argument would require that the Government have a majority.

Mr. WALSH. Exactly; but the committee does not ask that. The committee asks only for 3 out of 9.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield in order to permit me to make a suggestion in that connection?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. In the Federal land bank, the Government has 4 out of 7 directors, and its ownership of stock is nothing like 80 percent. In the Federal Reserve banks the Government has 3 out of 9, with no ownership of stock in the Federal Reserve banks. Here we are asking that out of 9 the Government have only 3, which would still give these institutions a representation of 2 to 1 as compared with the Government.

Mr. WALSH. I can well understand Mr. Fahey, whom I know intimately and for whom I have the highest regard, making the cautious statement which he made before the committee. I do not think it would be becoming of him, in his position, to make any criticism of the management of these banks, but I have reason to know that this situation of a hopeless minority representation on the part of the Government has not been helpful in many instances. I do not desire to criticize the management of the banks, because I think on the whole they have been very well managed. However, I do know that there have been instances where the Government has not been able to lay down a policy and administer these banks as it would choose to do.

Mr. COPELAND. When the Senator speaks about 80 percent, I assume he means 80 percent of all the investment made all over the country.

Mr. WALSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. COPELAND. Because in my State of New York alone the building-and-loan associations own 40 percent of the stock of the bank.

Mr. WALSH. Perhaps the Senator's State can have 40 percent of the directors and no more.

Mr. COPELAND. What is being proposed here would mean that we would have left in New York one director, despite the fact that New York owns 40 percent of the stock. That is not fair.

Mr. WALSH. I cannot follow the Senator. If the provision recommended by the committee shall be adopted, the New York banks which are members of this bank will have 6 representatives and the Government will have 3.

Mr. COPELAND. Ultimately; that is true.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator's position is that he wants the Government to have only 2 representatives, and to have 9 representatives on the part of the banks which are members of this bank.

Mr. COPELAND. I said a moment ago that if we were considering this legislation de novo, I should be in favor of this proposal; but as it will work out practically with our bank it will mean that New York State, owning 40 percent of the stock in the bank in our region, will have one director, and the fairness of the Senator from Massachusetts will, I am sure, indicate to him that that is not right.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator the basis for his statement. How many directors has New York now?

Mr. COPELAND. We now have four.

Mr. BARKLEY. How many States are in the district served?

Mr. COPELAND. Two—New York and New Jersey. New York has 4 directors and New Jersey has 5.

Mr. WALSH. The two States, then, have 9 out of the 11.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. I desire to say to the Senator from New York that I think the point he makes is entitled to some consideration. The Congress enacted this law and fixed the local representation of the stockholders, and upon that basis they came into the institution, and the stockholders have the representation. Now that they have come into the institution it is proposed to say, "We got you to join it and told you that you would have this supervision, but now we want to take away the supervision which was offered to you when the law was enacted."

I desire to say to the Senator also that the Board has supervision over all the banks and can protect the public interests. That matter was discussed, and I do not think it is quite fair to Mr. Fahey to say that he does not know what is going on in the banks, because he is one of the most efficient of administrators. As chairman of the Board, he is in touch with the organization; and he says there can be no doubt that the experience with the present organization has been highly successful.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the building-and-loan associations in my State have given loyal support to this law, and have endeavored in every possible way to make it a success. We had to amend our State law in order to permit our building-and-loan associations to participate.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. With a total membership of 9 on the board of directors, 4 from New York and 5 from New Jersey, can the Senator explain how it happens that all 3 of those who would be left off are from New York?

Mr. COPELAND. It just happened that in the rotation of appointments the three from New York would be the ones left off the board.

Mr. BARKLEY. That situation would be only temporary, until there could be a readjustment of the six who would be left representing the institutions.

Mr. COPELAND. I suppose the Senator is consoling me with the thought that since New York deserves all the directors, it ultimately will have all of them.

Mr. BARKLEY. If there is any consolation in that. I doubt very much if it would be acceptable to New Jersey to admit that New York would be entitled to all of them. I do not see how New Jersey could get the majority.

Mr. COPELAND. We concede that New Jersey is in the Union. I do not suppose the Senator would concede that.

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, yes; the Senator not only concedes it, but he knows it.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. It seems to me the argument advanced on behalf of this amendment is precisely the same as if it should be proposed by law to reduce the size of the United States Senate one-third, and automatically retire all the Senators whose terms happen to expire next year.

Mr. COPELAND. That is exactly the same thing.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The difference is that the Senate would have no jurisdiction to reduce the number of Senators. It would take a constitutional amendment to deprive a State of a Senator. It could not be done by an amendment of this sort.

Mr. COPELAND. But the principle involved is exactly the same.

Mr. President, I make the point that in New York we have loyally supported this movement. We believe in it. We changed our law in order that we might participate; and yet, by the turn of the wheel of fate, it means that if this amendment shall be adopted as proposed, the New York building-and-loan associations, owning 40 percent of the stock, will have one representative on the Board.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. STEIWER. I do not understand the purpose of the motion of the Senator from South Carolina. Is it the purpose to strike out the section?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is to strike out section 3 of the committee amendment.

Mr. STEIWER. Has the committee amendment been agreed to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee amendment has not been agreed to.

Mr. STEIWER. Then, why does not the question recur upon the committee amendment?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The committee reported a single amendment in the nature of a substitute for the House bill. The Senator from South Carolina moved to amend the committee amendment by striking out section 3. The effect of the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina, if I am correctly informed, will be to leave the law as it now is with respect to directors, the number and the manner of their selection.

Mr. STEIWER. I think that is correct.

Mr. President, I desire to say just a word with respect to the pending amendment. The subcommittee gave very careful consideration to this proposal, and in agreeing to the amendment I think it had in mind some objectives which have not yet been referred to.

In the first place, this bank has not been an entire success because of the reluctance of the mutual savings banks and the other mutual institutions to come in. They have not come in chiefly for the reason that the building-and-loan associations have dominated the banks almost completely in every banking district in the United States. The Board believes, and the subcommittee concurred in that belief, that it was the part of wisdom, and that it would be greatly to the benefit of the institution if it could be so set up that the dominance of the building-and-loan associations would not be quite so complete in the long run.

It is most desirable, from the standpoint of the successful administration of these banks, that the mutual savings societies of the country be induced to become members of the home-loan bank. The structure of the old Board was not favorable from that standpoint. It is believed that the new proposal for a board of nine members will be far more favorable from that standpoint; and we reached the conclusion that we should be serving the cause of the banks by adopting the proposed amendment.

The argument is made here that such a course will destroy the representation of New York, or possibly of other individual States. I think temporarily that argument is sound. Until the readjustment period shall be over it will disturb the representation of some States; but I suggest to those who are interested in the correct conclusion with respect to this matter that these boards were not set up on a State basis in the first instance. They were not set up on a regional basis in the first instance. It would have been most unfortunate if the boards had been selected purely on a State or a regional basis. They were selected an a basis of representation for the members of the institution; and that basis will not be disturbed by the pending amendment, even though temporarily the State or regional distribution will be adversely affected.

The institutions owning the stock of the banks will be better served under this amendment than under the existing law, and the interest of the Federal Government will be more logically represented under the amendment than under the existing law, and the mutual savings institutions and other savings institutions will have more inducement to come into the system under this amendment than under existing law.

The Senate can, of course, vote down the committee's recommendation, if it desires so to do; but I hope the Senate will not vote down the committee's recommendation on any argument made on the floor up to this time. All those factors were taken into account by the Board and by the subcommittee, and all were rejected in yielding to what we thought was a stronger argument.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. Is there any doubt in the mind of the Senator that these banks have been well operated?

Mr. STEIWER. In the main, they have been reasonably well operated; but we are looking to the expansion of the banks and the improvement of the system; and are not content merely to stand still with what we have. If the Senator desires to stand still with what we have he can vote for the amendment, and if it shall be adopted the present system will be retained, and we shall be dominated by the building-and-loan associations without drawing into the system a great group of mortgage institutions which make up the savings institutions of the country.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me on that point?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. On the question as to the interests of the savings banks, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] asked the chairman of the Board, "Is the savings-bank interest really different from the building and loan, or is there just some feeling that on some occasions it might be different?" To which Mr. Fahey replied, "It ought not to be any different so far as its relation to the whole mortgage problem is concerned"; and later he referred to the fact that the only difference was as to the terms of loans. He took the position, however, that there ought not to be any difference between the interests of the building-and-loan associations and the interests of the savings banks.

Mr. STEIWER. I think that is true. It ought not to be different, and yet the fact is that the savings institutions, which are very important institutions in many States, have been reluctant to intrust their business to boards of directors dominated by building-and-loan associations, because the building-and-loan group are very tightly organized. They have the building-and-loan league through which they operate. I am not criticizing those institutions. Thus far they have been the main support of the home-loan banking system, and for that they are entitled to great credit. We can leave the institution in its present form and make it more serviceable to that group, or we can make it serviceable to all the other institutions to which I have referred.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, does the Senator from Oregon know or can the Senator from Ohio advise me whether, on the boards of the present banks, there is any representative of the savings institutions?

Mr. BULKLEY. There is no representative of the savings institutions. The directors are elected by the bank board or appointed by the Home Loan Bank Board in Washington.

Mr. BARKLEY. Two out of the 11 are supposed to be representatives of the public?

Mr. BULKLEY. Yes. I do not know what number of those may be savings-institution representatives.

Mr. BARKLEY. They are not chosen as representatives of the savings institutions?

Mr. BULKLEY. No; they are not, nor are the nine chosen as representatives of the building-and-loan associations; but the fact is that the building-and-loan association representatives comprise nearly 100 percent of the membership in the home-loan bank, and consequently the nine directors are in effect representatives of the building-and-loan institutions.

Mr. BARKLEY. The situation is that while the savings institutions themselves, as I understand, have not come here, through an organization or as individuals, and asked that a change be made in the set-up of the board of directors, the Home Loan Board feels that to give the public one more representative and to reduce the number of those now in effect representing the building-and-loan associations would open the door for them to come in and join the institution and help make it a further and greater success.

Mr. BULKLEY. I think that is the point. I think that is what Mr. Fahey has in mind. There is no necessary difference in interest between the building-and-loan institutions and the savings banks, and still there is a psychological barrier because the savings banks feel it is too much of a building-and-loan association institution.

Mr. BARKLEY. They would not then feel that they are frozen out as they may now feel?

Mr. BULKLEY. That is the point, as I understand.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, as to the argument that the savings banks decline to come into the organization, let me suggest that the building-and-loan associations put their money into it and came in because the law provided nine local directors. Now that we have persuaded the building-and-loan associations to join and to put their money into it, it is proposed to change the law and reduce the number of directors elected by those who put their money in it, and to authorize a board in Washington to appoint representatives of some banks which do not belong to the organization and which have refused to join the organization.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. BULKLEY. The Senator surely is not going to make any point that we are unduly reducing the representation of people who have their money in it? Eighty percent of the money is Government money, with 2 directors out of 11.

Mr. BYRNES. That was the first statement I made in presenting the amendment. I am speaking solely on the proposal which has been made that we should reduce the membership because only building-and-loan associations join, and that we should name the representatives of savings banks to the Board in Washington. I do not think that is a very effective argument to induce us to change the membership of the Board.

Mr. BARKLEY. Do the building-and-loan associations feel that with 6 out of the 9 directors they will be unduly handicapped in having 20 percent of the stock represented in the action of the Board?

Mr. BYRNES. There is not a thing in the bill providing for membership of building-and-loan associations. There is simply a provision that those who invest shall have the right to select directors, and they selected their directors. Now it is proposed to change the law and to reduce the number of directors elected by local stockholders, and to center more authority in the Board at Washington, when the Board itself says the present system is working in a highly satisfactory manner and there is no reason for a change.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, let us go back for a moment to the origin of these institutions. The Senator from South Carolina speaks about the building-and-loan associations being urged and induced to go into the home-loan banks. As a matter of fact, the building-and-loan associations were mainly instrumental in organizing these banks. The Home Loan Bank Act was passed in 1932. It was supposed at that time that it would provide money for loans on homes and do precisely what we will have to do under the Home Loan Act—save them from foreclosure. It was supposed that the institution organized under the act of 1932 would perform the function of making loans to home owners in distress. It did not succeed because of the domination of the building-and-loan associations, whose representatives completely took charge and added their weight in the management of the banks.

I am not criticizing the building-and-loan associations. I am in full sympathy with their operation. They have done well. But why should the whole function of making loans on homes in the country be turned over to building-and-loan associations or to an institution dominated by them?

The result was that they did not supply the funds; they did not finance the operation at which we were aiming; and so we organized in 1933 the Home Owners' Loan Bank. That organization has taken charge of these loans and served the country well in every direction. Everyone recognizes that to be the fact. The home-loan bank organization has not developed, has not increased, has not expanded to meet the expectations which were originally had for it and its operations. Inasmuch as the Government put up 80 percent of the capital of the home-loan banks, the Government agencies ought to have more than 2 out of 11 on the board of directors which manages the institution. While they have done some good work, and in the main satisfactorily, they have not done what was expected originally and will not do it because they are dominated by one group—the building-and-loan association group. The representatives of that group have managed the whole thing; they have conducted the business of the home-loan banks.

There are other institutions ready to make loans, ready to accommodate those needing help for saving the homes of the country. Why not give them a chance to do so? Why change somewhat this set-up which has been in operation? I do not criticize them particularly, but I say it is perfectly reasonable and fair to expand their operations and invite other institutions to join and to help provide the finances. We ought to realize to some extent their complete domination of this institution.

We provide in the provision as reported that the public interest shall have 3 directors, and that the members of the building-and-loan association group, if it may be so stated, shall have 6. It seems to me that is perfectly reasonable and perfectly fair.

For the good of the country, for the purpose of meeting the needs and demands of the people generally, I think we ought to expand the building-and-loan bank institution as well as the Home Owners' Loan institution.

The building-and-loan interests have been invited and urged to come into this institution; they have seized control of it. We want other people to join this bank. For that reason we ought to take away the complete and absolute domination of one group, and spread it out, and particularly give the Federal authorities a little more representation on the Board.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, it is true that this law originated with the building-and-loan associations. I happened to speak before the National Building & Loan Association in Kansas City about 10 years ago, and afterward had a conference with the directors; and at their request I introduced in the Senate, about 9 or 10 years ago, a home-loan-bank bill.

This measure is their measure. It was their enthusiasm which made possible the passage of the original law. Everybody here seems to concede that they have given it very generous support.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. In that connection, I desire to say that out of some ten or twelve thousand building-and-loan associations which are eligible to membership, I think there are about 2,400 that are now members of this home-loan bank set-up.

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. And it may be said that while the building-and-loan associations did ask for this legislation originally, and that they got behind it and were very enthusiastic for it, they were for it, of course, as we all know, as many other private institutions were for legislation affecting them, as a life-saver. They wanted the Government to set up these organizations.

Mr. COPELAND. There is nothing unique about that. I observed that the biggest banks in the country, the great railroads, and all the other corporations, were seeking a life-saver, too. The building-and-loan associations are not alone in that respect.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield further, I do not know any of them that were able, in obtaining that life-saving apparatus, to secure 9 out of 11 representatives on the board that operated it.

Mr. COPELAND. No; but they got all the money, and that was even more important.

Mr. BARKLEY. They got nearly all of the members of the Board in this instance.

Mr. COPELAND. These other institutions got all the money, even if they were not on the Board; so it is a good thing that we have one organization where those who are interested in building the homes of this country can have something to say about the distribution of the money. It would seem that even now it is easier for some great corporations to get money than it is for the plain, ordinary people to do so.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the Senator will bear in mind that when the Reconstruction Finance Corporation makes loans to banks, it practically takes charge of the management of the banks. No officers may be elected without their approval.

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; I know that. I also know that anyone desiring a loan from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has to furnish securities so gilt-edged that any bank in America would make the loan. We set up that institution to make it possible for the manufacturers and business men to get money on more liberal terms; but now they are just as high-toned and highbrow as are the banks themselves.

Mr. President, the building-and-loan associations of this country have done more to build homes for the common people than all the other institutions in America. We all brag about them and say they are 100 percent valuable, but now we propose to hang a medal around their necks in the form of a millstone and throw them overboard.

I hope we shall save the building-and-loan interests by the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I could not help shedding tears when I heard the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] responding to the propaganda of the building-and-loan associations.

During my long experience here I have never known a more effective working propaganda organization than that of the building-and-loan organizations. They have been before the Banking and Currency Committee for years and years, pleading for something or other to relieve their condition or to improve their status. They have had equal opportunity with every other financial institution to get money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

I am sorry I cannot sob about the propagandists as the Senator from New York could in connection with his food and drug bill. He pleaded and pleaded with the Senate not to respond to the telegrams and the "iniquitous propaganda" we were receiving and defeat his food and drug bill.

Mr. President, after long hearings and careful study by the Subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee, and with the unanimous approval of the Banking and Currency Committee, so far as I recall, this bill is before the Senate for action. We are now asked, by the telegrams and the propaganda received from the building-and-loan associations, to undo that work.

The great, liberal building-and-loan associations that have subscribed 20 percent of the money to finance these banks feel that they must have nine-tenths of the control. I do not agree with such a proposition; and I hope the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] will be rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BULKLEY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] to strike section 3 from the committee amendment.

Mr. BULKLEY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment on page 23 of the bill, line 18, to strike out the words "for applicants who in good faith prior to the date this amendment takes effect, sought relief by formal application, letter, or other written memorandum, and who filed their applications", and to insert in lieu thereof the words "or applications filed." If this amendment should be agreed to, the section would then read:

SEC. 11. The first sentence of subsection (c) of section 4 of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(c) In order to provide for applications heretofore filed or applications filed within 60 days after this amendment takes effect, and for carrying out the other purposes of this section, the Corporation is authorized to issue bonds in an aggregate amount not to exceed $4,750,000,000, which may be exchanged as hereinafter provided, or which may be sold by the Corporation to obtain funds for carrying out the purposes of this section or for the redemption of any of its outstanding bonds; and the Corporation is further authorized to increase its total bond issue for the purpose of retiring its outstanding bonds by an amount equal to the amount of the bonds to be so retired (except bonds retired from payments of principal on loans), such retirement to be at maturity or by call or purchase or exchange or any method prescribed by the Board with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That no bonds issued under this subsection, as amended, shall have a maturity date later than 1952."

The effect of the amendment, therefore, it will be seen, would be to permit applications for loans to be filed 60 days after the enactment of the measure.

I realize from the statement of the Senator from Ohio, who has the bill in charge, and I think I agree with him, that it is desirable to fix a date for the closing up of this business. Senators will remember that the Board ceased considering applications for loans after it became apparent that more applications were on file than could be satisfied with the money on hand.

The amendment of the committee, if not modified, would have the effect of preventing any application being made and considered after the law became effective unless the applicants had filed their applications prior to that time or unless they had submitted letters or memoranda asking for loans.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that it is unwise and unfair to cut off these applications unless we first fix a reasonable time within which applications can be filed. I know, and I presume every other Senator has had the same experience, that when the Board decided not to accept any new applications those desiring to make applications understood, and I think they got the impression from my letters and from the letters of other Senators, that the money was practically exhausted and that it would be useless to file applications, but that the Congress undoubtedly would extend the law, and the people have been resting under the assurance, practically, and under the belief that they would have an opportunity to submit their applications, which they have never as yet had.

I give it to the Senate as my judgment that if we pass the measure without this amendment, or without some similar amendment, there will be no end to the complaints that will be made by people who intended to make applications and did not make them because the Board ceased to receive applications on account of the exhaustion of the fund.

I think we ought to remember also that this business is almost a sacred one. We are lending money to save homes; we are not giving it away. If the Board transacts its business properly and acts conservatively, the Government is not going to lose a cent as a result of these operations, but will at least make enough to pay the expense to which the Government has been put on account of the law, and perhaps more. There is no reason why an applicant who is worthy and who applies for a loan just after the law becomes effective should be turned down and preference given to someone who had been better informed, or someone who had made an application before the exhaustion of the fund. In fact, many of the people who will make applications have waited, hoping that times would improve so that it would be unnecessary for them to make applications. They have sacrificed, they have lived very closely and economically, and are in exactly the same positions, it seems to me, with those who have applied heretofore.

I realize that Senators want to take the Government out of this business as soon as possible, but we ought not to take it out just at this time. We are not out of the depression. We are in the midst of it; and the worthy people who desire to make application, who believe they can yet make application under the law, are going to be shut off unless they have already made application and have failed.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. When the act was originally passed, it was expected and intended to take care of home owners who were in distress at the time the act was passed. While it is true that the law permitted the Home Owners' Loan Corporation to make loans for a period of 3 years, which would run it up to June 1936, as a matter of fact the Corporation ran out of resources last year, as the Senator has stated, and as we all know. The Corporation now has on file unclosed applications amounting to about $3,000,000,000, so that the $1,750,000,000 we are providing in the pending bill is not sufficient to take care of all the applications now on file, and I think we could reasonably assume that those whose applications were already on file were more in distress than those whose applications have never been filed, and which might be filed in any 60-day period or any other period. Does the Senator think we ought to make it possible to deny loans to those who have been distressed, and who have filed their applications, in order to take care of the applications of those who have not been in distress up to this time, but who may consider themselves in distress during the next 60 days?

Mr. NORRIS. I will answer the Senator's question. It is a very fair one, I think. I answer it in the negative.

It does not follow that we ought to vote down the amendment, as I see it, by any means. I cannot weigh in the balance and tell whether this applicant or that applicant is in the greater distress. It is true, however, that people are now in distress who are just as worthy, just as deserving, as people who were in distress during the earlier stages of the depression, and there is no reason why we should take care of one and not of the other.

Undoubtedly it will follow that not all the applications which are on file will be acted upon favorably. There will be a great many of them which, for this reason or that reason, will be turned down. Suppose we do not have enough money; are we going to say to that class of people, "We will take care only of the first ones who file, and turn down the rest"? If we need to appropriate more money to lend to those who have not yet made applications, but who will make them, and who are in the same distress as those who have previously made applications, it will be just as easy as it was at the beginning when we made provision to take care of those who then were in distress.

The Senator says it was intended when we passed the existing law to take care of the people who were then in distress. Admitting that to be true for the sake of the argument, what about the people who have since fallen into a condition of distress? Are they any less worthy because many of them have curtailed their living expenses longer and striven longer to get themselves out of the dilemma than other men who made applications some time ago? I do not see how we can differentiate.

We loan money to banks, to railroads, and to corporations; and why should we stop loaning money to men who wish to save their homes right in the middle of the depression? We have started to help those in distress by lending them money. Those who are coming now with applications are just as worthy as those who previously have made applications. Why should we stop now?

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, would the Senator like a comment right there?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. BULKLEY. The difference is that 2 years ago, when the Home Owners' Loan Act was passed, there was not only distress on the part of the home owners but there was a great deal of distress on the part of those who held their mortgages, so that it was difficult for the mortgagee to carry on and to let interest go unpaid and to let maturities pass without collections. Now, private capital is coming back into enterprises that have money to loan. There is more money available to be loaned by banks today. There is more money available to be loaned by building-and-loan associations than there was at the time we enacted that law.

Mr. NORRIS. I hope so.

Mr. BULKLEY. Now, it is perfectly clear that the Home Owners' Loan Corporation is as good a lender as there is in the country, and any home owner under the necessity of putting a mortgage on his home would probably rather owe the money to the Home Owners' Loan Corporation than to anybody else. So, we can always do business so long as we are willing to keep this institution open; but unless we intend to go on and make it permanent, we must bring it to an end and encourage private capital to go ahead and make these loans.

Mr. NORRIS. This amendment will eventually bring it to an end, but we are giving notice that we have not yet quit. There are many persons who will be deceived by this action unless we do give the notice. No one is going to be hurt if it is a success and is going on.

Mr. BULKLEY. I think it is fair to say to the Senator that some of the private lending agencies will be discouraged if we now open the system up to new applications.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I desire to ask the Senator from Ohio if the present law does not require that a home owner making application for a loan must have been distressed at a given time. Was it not June 13, 1933?

Mr. BULKLEY. Yes; that is correct—June 13, 1933.

Mr. GORE. The statement of the Senator from Nebraska is not quite so pertinent as it might be if it were not for that fixed date.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not catch that remark, Mr. President.

Mr. GORE. I say that applicants for loans under the existing law must show that they were distressed on June 13, 1933. I believe that is the date. So those who have since become distressed could not qualify under the law in any event.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well. Let us give those in distress within the next 60 days an opportunity to make a showing, and not cut them off without giving them any notice. Suppose they show that they were in distress in June 1933, and they have withheld their applications in the belief that the time was going to be extended, and they are still in distress. Why should that not appeal to us and cause us to give them time in which to make that kind of showing? It seems to me it ought to be all the more reason why we should not cut off those people without letting them have an opportunity to apply. Who is going to lose by it? If this is done right, it is not the Government that will lose.

The Senator says the mortgagees were those who in part, at least, brought about the passage of this law. It was done to relieve the mortgagees, and apparently they are now relieved sufficiently so that they want to lend some more money. If we have relieved the mortgagees, which was a worthy thing to do, why not do something for the relief of the mortgagors? Let the people who have the homes, and who are willing to mortgage them, be heard before we cut them off without any notice whatever.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BULKLEY. I have asked the Senator to yield merely in order that I may correct the statement made by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. It was substantially correct, but there is an exception in existing law. The present law provides that the mortgage is not eligible—

> Unless the applicant was in involuntary default on June 13, 1933, with respect to the indebtedness on his real estate and is unable to carry or refund his present mortgage indebtedness: Provided, That the foregoing limitation shall not apply in any case in which it is specifically shown to the satisfaction of the Corporation that a default after such date was due to unemployment or to economic conditions or misfortune beyond the control of the applicant.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator for reading that provision of the law. I think we all remember why we put that in; and applicants would now have to make that showing. Any new applicant would have to make the same showing. If, however, on account of unemployment—which means on account of the terrible depression—a family should be shown to be in distress, why should we not permit the man in distress to make application and secure a loan if he should comply with the law?

That reminds me also that many of the applicants now having applications on file will undoubtedly be unable to show that they can fully comply with the law, and their applications therefore will be rejected; so we must not take the number as final. It will be a much less number than the number of applications now on file.

Mr. BULKLEY. That has been taken into consideration. There are more than 800,000 applications now pending, and the estimate is that about 500,000 of them would qualify for loans. As the average loan amounts to $3,000, it would take $1,500,000,000, which is the figure on which the bill is based.

Mr. NORRIS. Let us assume that to be true and that we cannot go any further even though it be shown that the new applicants are just as much in distress as were the old ones. We are going to stop now; we are going so far, to take care of so many, and we are going to take care of no one else because some men in private business think they are now able to make the loans. I do not believe the argument is good if we are going into the business at all. It seemed to me in the beginning it was a worthy thing to do. If there was one place where we could do good, it seemed to me it was to save the homes of the American people. We have done a good job in a general way, and we ought not to stop now in the middle of the depression and not go any further.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, in support of all that has been said by the Senator from Nebraska I wish to submit a few further observations. As I stated on the floor of the Senate earlier in the afternoon, when hearings were being held by the Subcommittee on Banking and Currency I appeared and suggested by way of recommendation that those who heretofore had not filed applications be permitted hereafter to file applications in order to participate in the additional $1,750,000,000.

I believe with the Senator from Nebraska that simply because a person has not heretofore filed an application for a loan is no reason why he should not be availed an opportunity now to do so. There are many people in the country today who will seek loans from this $1,750,000,000 who are even more worthy and who are now even more distressed than were some of the applicants who filed applications for loans immediately after the enactment of the law in June 1933.

According to the Chairman of the Subcommittee on Banking and Currency, the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY], it is said that at the time of the enactment of the law it was understood it was being enacted for the purpose of serving and protecting the home owners of the country who were then in distress. If, therefore, we accept his argument, it would appear to me that only those who were in distress at that immediate time when the law was enacted could now get relief. According to the argument of the senior Senator from Ohio, if we accept that argument, people who became distressed a few months after the enactment of the law could not, within the law, and legally, make application for a loan.

Mr. BULKLEY. Of course, I explained that they could, and took pains to read from the law to that effect.

Mr. REYNOLDS. In pursuance of my argument in regard to the matter, I recognize the fact that when the first $3,000,000,000 had been exhausted by applicants whose requirements had been met in order that they might save their homes throughout the length and breadth of the land, there were then on file applications involving several hundred million dollars. As has been said, the appropriation of $1,750,000,000 which we are about to make cannot take care of the applications which are already on file; but a large number of the applications now on file will not be approved; that is to say, they will not be passed upon by the legal department and the appraisal department of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, because the executives of the Corporation in every section of the country are safeguarding the taxpayers' money and are safeguarding the Government's money in the making of loans.

There are people in our land today who are even more distressed at this hour than at the time we enacted the law in 1933. I cannot understand why we should prevent worthy applicants who are in distress at this time from endeavoring to take advantage of this measure and to get a portion of the appropriation in the form of a loan.

Mr. WALSH. I do not understand that the class of people for whom the Senator is speaking will be affected in any way by this measure, but that they today or tonight or tomorrow may make applications for loans. The issue here seems to be whether or not the door by which these people may make application shall be closed on the day the bill is signed by the President or 60 days thereafter. The people whom the Senator is describing, who are now more in distress than were people 2 years ago, can make application up to the time of the signing of the bill. The issue is a very narrow one. It seems to me we ought to agree upon 30 days.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I should like the opinion of the Senator from Nebraska. It is my opinion that the distressed home owners of the country should have at least 60 to 90 days after the passage of the bill in which to make application for loans. Of course, I realize that not everyone who files an application can get relief.

Mr. WALSH. The point I want to make is that I understand the bill does not change in any way the requirement of evidence that must be presented in order to make application.

Mr. REYNOLDS. That is my understanding.

Mr. WALSH. But the period within which new applications for loans may be received is ended upon the signing of the bill, no matter how distressed a person may be.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I am of the opinion that the present home owners who are in need of loans should have a period of from 30 to 90 days after the passage of the bill in which to present their applications.

Mr. WALSH. Does not the Senator think it possible to end the discussion by agreeing upon 30 days?

Mr. REYNOLDS. May I suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that the Senator from Massachusetts has inquired whether it would be possible for us to agree on a time limit for the filing of applications?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. There is nothing in the amendment which I have offered that has anything to do with time. I have stricken out certain language and inserted other language, but in the amendment I have not changed the language as it relates to the 60-day limitation. That would be subject to amendment afterward or at any time, of course.

Mr. WALSH. Under the language as written in the bill, applications may be made up to the time of the signing of the bill. The Senator's amendment, I understand, would extend that time 60 days.

Mr. NORRIS. It does not change the 60-day provision in the bill, but it does change the effect.

Mr. BULKLEY. There is no doubt about it that it does not change the wording, but, as the Senator has well said, it does change the effect.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, it does; but I could not modify my amendment in any way. That matter, however, might come up afterward.

Mr. BULKLEY. If the Senator should desire to modify his amendment, he could carry it a few words further.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, I could; yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; the Senator could make the period 30 days, and that would settle the matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee amendment is still open to amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, do I understand that the Senator from Nebraska accepted the suggestion of making the time 30 days?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I said I could not do it in this amendment, because the words "60 days" are in the text.

Mr. BARKLEY. Inasmuch as the effect of the language has been changed so as to open it up for all sorts of applications, I think the Senate ought to be allowed to vote on whether or not it wishes to reduce the period to 30 days. For that purpose I move to substitute "30" for "60" on page 23, line 21.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, it seems to me that is restricting to entirely too short a period the privilege of the individual who has not heretofore made an application. By the time the proposed legislation is enacted, and the President signs the bill, and the news gets out over the country, the 30 days will have elapsed.

I am not in favor of restricting the right of the individual to get a loan under a measure which provides every character of generous treatment to the loan companies—either building-and-loan companies or mortgage companies—as this measure does. This measure is very generous toward the loan companies. It does not say that after 60 days they shall have no privilege of selling their mortgages to the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, but it provides more generous consideration for them than we have heretofore extended under the law. When, however, it comes to the individual who has not, forsooth, heretofore filed his application, the bill in its original form would exclude him entirely from even making an application. I think we should allow the individual at least 60 days.

It is all right to turn over this business to the private institutions; but we must remember that the private institutions are being maintained by Federal funds. In this very measure we say to a building-and-loan association, "You may discount certain kinds of your mortgages for 90 percent of the unpaid principal." We do not close the door on them. Senators talk about the exhaustion of funds for the individual. Why are we so interested in the exhaustion of funds for the individual when we provide ample funds for the private institutions to carry on their business and to stimulate their business? I think it is all right to do that; but, in doing so, let us not discriminate against the individual.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from Florida, I think, made an error in his statement awhile ago that the building-and-loan associations are not limited insofar as their selling their mortgages to the Home Owners' Loan Corporation is concerned. Where the building-and-loan associations come into the picture, and where any other money lender comes into it who has a mortgage on a distressed home, is that the Home Owners' Loan Corporation can refinance that obligation and take it over in lieu of the building-and-loan association, or the savings bank, or anybody else; but after the time expires within which a home owner may make application to refinance his loan with the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, automatically the building-and-loan associations get out of the picture, because they cannot sell a mortgage to the Home Owners' Loan Corporation unless the home owner has come in and made his application under the law.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The Senator and I put different constructions upon the language of the bill. I shall not read the entire section, but I shall read section 10b:

> Each Federal home-loan bank is authorized to make advances to nonmember mortgages approved under title II of the National Housing Act. Such mortgages must be chartered institutions having succession and subject to the inspection and supervision of some governmental agency—

And so forth.

Then it further provides that the advances may be made at the rate of 90 percent of the unpaid principal.

Mr. BARKLEY. That applies to the home-loan banks, not to the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. The Senator has the two confused.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The present law provides that loans may be made by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation to banks and to every character of loaning institution.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course the Senator must keep in mind that the Home Owners' Loan Corporation and the home-loan banks are entirely different. There is no connection between them.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I understand that thoroughly. That is the A B C of this. We all learned that sometime ago.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am glad to know that the Senator has learned that. I did not mean to reflect at all on the Senator's knowledge of everything that is in all these laws, and I am sorry if my remarks were so interpreted.

Mr. TRAMMELL. We take all this as a matter of pleasantry. Apparently, however, the Senator from Kentucky desires to make it appear that I did not know what I was talking about.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am not so sure that the Senator does. [Laughter.]

Mr. TRAMMELL. I am not sure that the Senator from Kentucky does. He reminds me a good deal of an incident which occurred in the legislature of a certain State. A member got up and talked for 30 or 40 minutes, and another member said to him, in the open forum, "What were you talking about? Which side of this issue are you on?" The first member said, "If you are not capable of understanding which side of the issue I am on, I am not going to tell you." So the Senator from Kentucky may get in that attitude himself. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Senator from Florida make any personal application of that story? [Laughter.]

Mr. TRAMMELL. As I was saying, it is all right to build up the building-and-loan associations, and to direct as much of this business as is proper through private channels; but why can we not do that without discriminating against individuals? That is my position.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, the Senator must understand that no corporation can, or ever could, borrow from the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. There is no possibility of discrimination, because the only borrowers are individuals and home owners.

Mr. TRAMMELL. They can discount mortgages for them, too.

Mr. BULKLEY. No; this has nothing in the world to do with discounting mortgages. The Senator is confusing this agency with another one.

Mr. TRAMMELL. They make advances on mortgages.

Mr. BULKLEY. The home-loan banks; not the Home Owners' Loan Corporation.

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is part of the set-up.

Mr. BULKLEY. It is a different organization, set up under a different act.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I think there ought to be a period of 60 days in which individuals may file their applications.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I desire to know what is the pending question. I cannot tell from the argument.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, may the amendment be stated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 23, line 21, it is proposed to strike out "60" and insert "30."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky to the amendment of the committee.

On a division, the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I desire to ascertain from the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] whether he would like to proceed to a conclusion with the bill this afternoon.

Mr. BULKLEY. I have no strong preference.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have an amendment which I should like to present. I do not think it will take very much time.

Mr. BULKLEY. There are two or three other amendments. I do not object to a recess at this time.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator does not object, then, I will move an executive session. First, however, I desire to offer the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas offers an amendment to the amendment of the committee which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the committee amendment, at the end of section 8, it is proposed to add the following:

> That section 4 (d) of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, as amended, be amended by adding: "Provided, That for the purposes of this act, levies of assessments upon real property, made by any special district organized in any State for public improvements, shall be treated as general tax levies are treated, and the lien created by such improvement districts upon the real property within said district, to secure the payment of such improvement-district levies shall be considered as attaching to such real property at the time fixed by such improvement district for the payment of such levies and assessments and not before; and, for the purposes of this act, the lien of any mortgage placed upon any such real property by the owner thereof shall be considered a prior lien with reference to such improvement-district lien securing the payment of all said improvement district assessments not due at the time the said owner executes such mortgage. The reasonableness of the total annual burden of taxes and assessments of all kinds upon any property offered as security for the payment of a loan made by the Corporation and the effect of such total levies upon the loanable value of such property are matters for the determination of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation Board, but no deduction shall be made from the loanable value of any property for improvement district assessments or levies not due at the time of making such loan in any instance where the total annual taxes and assessments borne by the said property for all purposes does not exceed a sum which, in the discretion of the Board, is a reasonable annual tax burden for such property: Provided, That in arriving at the loanable value, in no instance shall any deductions be made on account of such improvement district liens, taxes, and/or assessments not due at the time of making the loan where the aggregate amount of annual taxes, levies, and assessments of all kinds and for all purposes upon the property offered for security does not exceed a sum equal to 5 percent of the value of such property as fixed by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation appraisement."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, before we dispose of the pending bill, I desire to ask the Senator from Ohio in regard to a provision which was supposed to have been placed in the bill by the House, providing for loans upon homes connected with stores, where there might be a store or business room in connection with the home. Was that retained in the bill?

Mr. BULKLEY. It is not in that form. I will explain the matter to the Senator. The House inserted an amendment to existing law. The House amendment is shown on page 6, beginning in line 21, "upon which there is located a dwelling for not more than 4 families and containing not more than 1 shop, or storeroom, used by the owner as a home", and so forth. The language which the House would have inserted in existing law by that amendment is contained in the words, "and containing not more than one shop, store, or storeroom."

The Home Owners' Loan Corporation have by regulation recognized that a shop may be part of a home. If the Senator will indulge me a moment, I will read what Mr. Fahey said before the committee.

Mr. BORAH. All I desire to know is whether or not under the regulations of the Corporation that may be accomplished which was designed to be accomplished by the House provision.

Mr. BULKLEY. Yes. I was just about to read the regulation. It is as follows:

In cases of combined business and residence property, care should be taken to determine that the dwelling portion of that property is suitable for use as a home and that it is being occupied or held as the applicant's bona fide home. Where the business is clearly incidental to the home, in that only a small portion of the property is used for business purposes and the remainder is the bona fide home of the applicant, the property is eligible. Where the home is clearly incidental to the business, the property is ineligible and the loan should be rejected. Where it is doubtful whether the business is incidental to the home, or the home incidental to the business, the case should be forwarded to the Loan Review Division in Washington.

Mr. BORAH. Does the measure before the Senate broaden that rule?

Mr. BULKLEY. It does slightly, and I think very clearly. The language proposed in the Senate committee amendment, as shown on page 23, line 9, contains this language, "upon which there is located a dwelling or dwellings for not more than four families, which is used in whole or in part by the owner as a home", and so forth. We think that makes it clearer than the House amendment, and accomplishes the same purpose.

Mr. BORAH. I agree with the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Arkansas intended that his amendment should be pending.

Mr. ROBINSON. I intend to move for an executive session unless the Senate desires to complete the consideration of the bill this evening, and I have been advised that that cannot be done. There are some other amendments to be offered.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I present an amendment which I propose to offer to the pending bill, which I ask to have printed and to lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have printed an amendment to be offered to the pending Home Owners' Loan Corporation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

PREVENTION OF PROFITEERING IN TIME OF WAR—REFERENCE OF BILL

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LA FOLLETTE in the chair). There was received in a message from the House of Representatives this morning House bill 5529, an act to prevent profiteering in time of war and to equalize the burdens of war and thus provide for the national defense, and to promote peace.

Some consideration has been given to the question of the reference of this bill to an appropriate committee. It is the understanding of the present occupant of the chair that after consultation among the Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD]; the Chairman of the Special Committee on Investigation of the Munitions Industry, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE]; the majority leader, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]; and the minority leader, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], it has been agreed that the bill shall first be referred to the Special Committee on Investigation of the Munitions Industry, and that when reported back to the Senate it is to be referred to the Senate Committee on Military Affairs. With that statement, the Chair so refers the bill.

DETAILED REPORTS ON OCEAN MAIL CONTRACTS

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, 2 days ago I submitted a very short resolution, being Senate Resolution 116, to which, so far as I am informed, there is no objection. It calls upon the Postmaster General to send to the Senate reports on ocean mail contracts, individual contracts which have been made by him, and to which reference was made in the message of the President and the report of the Postmaster General to the President. I should like to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I will state to the Senator from Alabama that the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] informed me that he desired to be present when that resolution was taken up.

Mr. BLACK. Then, I will not make the request, because the Senator from New York is not in the Chamber at this time.

Mr. ROBINSON. I should have to ask that it go over.

Mr. BLACK. I will make the request tomorrow.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Haltigan, one of its reading clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (H. R. 6359) to amend certain provisions relating to publicity of certain statements of income, and it was signed by the Vice President.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LA FOLLETTE in the chair) laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations (and withdrawing a nomination), which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received and nomination withdrawn, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nomination of Jacob Moore to be postmaster at New City, N. Y., in place of R. P. Blauvelt, which was ordered to be placed on the Executive Calendar.

CONFIRMATION OF NOMINATION OF POSTMASTER AT PORTALES, N. MEX.

Mr. McKELLAR. From the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads I report favorably the nomination of Lillian E. Howard to be postmaster at Portales, N. Mex., to succeed H. M. Armstrong.

I ask unanimous consent that the nomination be confirmed at this time. It has been delayed almost unduly. The two Senators from the State of New Mexico have stated they are willing to have this action taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee? The Chair hears none, and the nomination is confirmed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further reports of committees, the calendar is in order.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc. That completes the calendar.

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate, in legislative session, took a recess until tomorrow, Friday, April 12, 1935, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, APRIL 11, 1935

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Merciful God, so long as the human heart can breathe, "My Father", no trial, however keen, can wreck our faith and defeat our courage of soul. Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all His benefits. It is He that hath made us and not we ourselves; we are His people and the sheep of His pasture. We thank Thee that under Thy providence we have grown in all things that tend to make a nation great, but hold us to the realization that with every advancement comes greater responsibility. Set these words in all hearts: "Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it; except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain." The seed we sow today will be the harvest of tomorrow. O Ancient of Days, we pray that it may be the fruits of peace, righteousness, and joy. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, on what subject?

Mr. MONAGHAN. On the rule on the social-security bill. I may state to the gentleman that I tried to get time to discuss the rule but could not.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, not only is the State of California vitally interested in the passage of adequate old-age pensions as exemplified in the Townsend plan, but it is also vitally interested in the people of the District of Columbia.

I am in receipt of a communication from the Governor of the State submitting Joint Resolution No. 7 of the California State Assembly, wherein the Congress of the United States is petitioned to correct the present un-American condition, which exists in the District of Columbia, by the passage of a constitutional amendment extending representation in the National Congress to the people of the District of Columbia.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD this joint resolution of the California Assembly which seeks to correct this present un-American condition affecting the political status of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to the many splendid Representatives here from the State of California, for all of whom we have high respect and high regard, the California State Assembly passes some very unwise and uncalled-for resolutions, and I object to this one going into the RECORD.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 3 minutes on the subject of the terrible dust storms that are occurring in the Panhandle section of Oklahoma, which is in my district.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, I made a trip out to the Panhandle district of Oklahoma just a little over a week ago. I have lived there all my life, but I had no idea that conditions could be as bad as they are. The land is so blown and hummocked, and the surface of the soil has been whipped back and forth by the wind so long that it does not require anything more than a slight breeze to raise a cloud of dust. Mr. Speaker, if those farmers are not subsidized in some way, are not aided in some manner to stay there and fight that battle, it is going to be a problem directly up to the Government. Not only is the area that is blowing affected, but millions of acres to the east also are being ruined by the dirt which is carried over by the wind and deposited on the grass. There have been countless instances recently of cattle which have eaten the grass on which this dirt has been deposited which cattle, when cut open, would be found to have a large lump of dirt in their stomachs.

This is a problem that must be met practically, it cannot be met theoretically. Those people out there want to stay, if we will aid them. They have had three successive crop failures. If we will aid them to the extent that they can put their machinery in shape and live, they will stay out there on that battlefront; and when we do get some moisture they will plow that area, and it must be plowed, or listed, to a depth that it has not been plowed before. This will keep dust storms from recurring all summer long. Farmers are moving out by the hundreds. These dust storms will continue all summer, because no amount of rain will settle that dirt. The area must be turned over so as to get new soil on top, or it is going to continue to blow.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. TREADWAY. I would like to ask the gentleman whether similar storms have taken place in past years, and especially at a time quite a number of years back.

Mr. FERGUSON. We have always had dust storms, but we never had an area that was in such shape that rain would not bring vegetation over such a wide space.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. Would the gentleman be kind enough to tell the House what he knows from his personal experience in that country as to the reason for such storms coming on now and their not having occurred previously? It has been a very interesting question in my mind.

Mr. FERGUSON. They started in 1920 and continued at times clear up to 1932. Vast areas of that sod was broken out with one-way plows to a depth of about 2 inches sometimes; not over 3 inches, at any rate. They had three successive drought years. That pulverized the top soil and left a hard base below. It has been caused through mechanical means of farming. The good farmer who has plowed his soil to a good depth would be all right, his land is not blowing today; but it has been ruined by his neighbor who used these new and cheap methods, who used these underfinanced methods of farming the last 3 years. That has been the fixed, contributing cause, coupled with drought.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman's explanation is very interesting. I should infer, therefore, that the present condition is not the result of natural causes, that similar storms could have occurred in previous years, but now, owing to the condition of the plowed land, the soil is pulverized and the wind whips it up as dust, which it did not do previously.

Mr. FERGUSON. That is right.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a plan of attack in order to solve this problem which I have submitted to the Secretary of Agriculture and to the Director of the F. E. R. A., Mr. Hopkins, and also an account of the recent dust storms as carried in the Washington Post.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I do not know that I shall object—but I would like to ask the gentleman if those remarks are his own?

Mr. FERGUSON. These are my own remarks. Of course, the article appearing in the Washington Post is not my own, it being simply an account of the destruction caused by the dust storms in my own district.

Mr. RICH. Where did the newspaper account in the Post come from? Who wrote it? And why did the gentleman use a Washington newspaper article to insert in the RECORD?

Mr. FERGUSON. This article came through as an Associated Press dispatch from my district.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert the following plan of attack to solve wind erosion problem; submitted by me to the Secretary of Agriculture and to the Director of the F. E. R. A.; and newspaper account of recent dust storms:

1. FARM CREDIT ADMINISTRATION

A lenient policy of making summer fallow loans now at proposed rate of $1 per acre, with farmer granted privilege of making subsequent crop loan to plant listed acreage in erosion-resisting crops such as sorghum.

2. IMMEDIATE SURVEY BY COUNTY AGENTS AND WHEAT ALLOTMENT COMMITTEES TO DETERMINE COUNTIES IN AFFECTED AREAS ENTITLED TO EMERGENCY RELIEF TO COMBAT WIND EROSION

a. Survey by county agents and wheat allotment committees, to determine land that has been abandoned for cultivation, whether it be tenant operated, owner operated, or controlled by nonresident owner.

b. Farmers who indicate willingness or desire to farm on contour should have contour lines run by Soil Erosion Service, in return for agreement with Department of Agriculture to continue to farm on the contour.

c. Land shown by this survey that will probably be left out of cultivation and a menace to other operators should in the case of (1) tenant operated, and (2) owner operated land be made F. E. R. A. projects under the supervision of the Department of Agriculture, and operator be allowed from $1 to $1.50 an acre for dragging down hummocks and listing and planting to some sorghum crop. In return for this advance, operator should pledge reasonable share of crop.

d. Abandoned land with foreign owner should be optioned for purchase, if possible; if not, leased to the Government for crop rent for a period of 2 or 3 years. Placed under F. E. R. A. as a project, using farmers equipped to do the work and living closest to the farm on a contract basis of $1 to $1.50 an acre, depending on the condition of the land.

GENERAL STIPULATIONS

F. E. R. A. labor could be used to drag down and smooth out driftings along fences. All contracts should be subject to regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture, requiring that in case of sorghum crops planted nothing but grain should be harvested and all forage remain on the land, to be protected even from pasture, until such time as all danger of land blowing is removed.

Special F. E. R. A. drought-relief appropriations to States earmarked to be spent in drought sections only, to correct injustices now existing in the States where emergency drought-relief money is being spent over the entire State.

Immediate construction of approved flood-control and irrigation projects in devastated areas to give the people who are without any normal means of support, lacking even cows and chickens, living in an area almost impossible for humans to survive, a cash income and future insurance of social welfare due to impounding large areas of water.

CONCLUSION

This land must be farmed until it has a chance to get a vegetative cover. To abandon this area at this time would mean the destruction of millions of acres of adjoining land that as yet has not suffered. The only economic way to meet the problem, by making it possible for those who have been brave enough to remain to handle this land in such a way that it will cease to be a menace to the rest of the Nation. These families who have stayed can well be compared to the soldiers in front-line trenches, who, properly encouraged and supplied, will conquer this devastating dust problem and save millions of acres of good land immediately to the east from being utterly destroyed, as well as reclaiming an area that, if abandoned, will soon become an unclaimable desert.

DUST STORMS FORCE FLIGHT OF HUNDREDS—NEW DISASTER'S TOLL IN EIGHT STATES IN MILLIONS; TRAFFIC BLOCKED—TYPHOID RISE IS FEARED AS FLOODS SWEEP KENTUCKY

By the Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, April 10.—Grimy wagons and motor cars carried scores of families out of northwestern Oklahoma tonight in full flight from an eight-State dust storm—among the most severe of a devastating series.

Crop and live-stock damages, already piled high in uncounted millions, increased rapidly, principally in Kansas, Oklahoma, and Colorado. Parts of New Mexico, Iowa, Nebraska, and Texas also were hit.

Many schools and stores were closed in Colorado and Kansas. The business district at Scott City, Kans., was shut down for the third consecutive day.

More than 100 families have deserted Cimarron and Texas Counties in the northwestern Oklahoma Panhandle. Chester Lamar, F. E. R. A. administrator, said that 100 "normally self-sustaining" families have left Texas County alone within the last 30 days.

GRAPHIC TALES TOLD

The Oklahoma refugees told graphically of their distress.

"I'm trying to get some place where my children can at least live", said Mrs. Lydia Dower, of Hardesty, today, as she drove away by truck with her three children for Colorado. Atop the truck was the family goat.

"I had no chance to raise a crop here", explained Roy Woods, of Texhoma, as he set out for Utah.

"This farm is the fruit of my labor ever since my wife and I married 28 years ago", said T. A. Foster, of Texhoma, "but we are going to leave it. Fortunately, I inherited a farm in Linn County, Kans., where we can go."

Floyd Hudson, member of the corn-hog committee in Cimarron County, said "the dust has driven out all but 3 of the 40 families who once lived in the 6 townships south of Boise City, Okla."

Attributing conditions to the dust, Mrs. Mabel Lathrop, relief worker at Guymon, said "4,000 of the 5,500 families in 6 northwestern Oklahoma counties are on relief rolls."

ALL "HEADING EAST"

"We're heading east", was all many of the occupants of 36 truckloads of furniture sighted today between Guymon and Boise City would say.

Lacy Rankin, of Hardesty, Okla., set out for California with his wife and children, saying:

"We feared for the family's health if we stayed here. We couldn't make a go here, anyway, and we couldn't be worse off anywhere else."

Tom Blake, of Hardesty, lamented that "my family almost smothers to death every time there is a storm."

But the Colorado to which Blake is going also reported more dust today. The fifth dust storm in 5 days swirled over Lamar, causing the dismissal of schools and the closing of stores at noon.

SCHOOLS CLOSED

Every school in Baca County, Colo., was closed. One hundred and eighty school children and passengers on busses prepared to spend their second night at Pritchet, Colo., in a school building and nearby homes.

Springfield (Colo.) stores exhausted their supplies of sponges, sought as "dust masks." Trains in the region were compelled to stop frequently. One arrived 12 hours late. A truck driver required 5½ hours to drive 50 miles to Lamar.

Kansas, where dust has been spinning in low-hanging clouds for more than a month, was virtually blanketed in today's storm.

Crop statisticans presented a picture of gloom. L. C. Aitcher, superintendent of the Fort Hays (Kans.) agricultural experiment station, said little wheat survives in the Northwest and even if rain should come it would be of doubtful value.

"Very poor" was the Federal official word on crop conditions in western Kansas, where a large part of the country's wheat is grown.

The trial of Miles "Steamboat" Ware at Tribune, Kans., on a charge of slaying a railroad conductor was ordered adjourned indefinitely until the dust storm has abated. Judge Fred J. Evans wore goggles at today's brief session.

TWO CHILDREN RESCUED

Two small children of D. B. Weeden, tying themselves together with a rope to avoid becoming separated in the storm, were found today near Vanceville, Kans., after wandering all night in the blinding dust. The searching parties exceeded 100.

Storm reports ran like this:

Meade, Kans.: Schools closed; little wheat left; visibility, 50 feet.

Garden City, Kans.: Stores closed; tourists compelled to stop; trains behind time.

Wellington, Kans.: "It's the year's worst."

Emporia, Kans.: Storm wiped out all trace of an early morning rain.

Dighton, Kans.: Haven't seen the sun since dust storm set in Monday morning, and the dust is growing worse.

Manhattan, Kans.: All Kansas State College athletic practice called off.

RAIN BRINGS MUD

Topeka, Kans.: Rain followed dust and covered all with mud. Frank Stone, of the highway patrol, checked to determine if any State roads should be closed in the interest of safety.

Scott City, Kans.: A man who promised his wife, visiting in eastern Nebraska, that he would come at once when their baby arrived, received the news this morning but was unable to keep his promise because of the dust.

Eastern Colorado farmers near the stricken Oklahoma Panhandle were reported determined to "stick it out."

Fort Dodge, Iowa, reported dust so intense that motorists had to turn on headlights.

In Nebraska, Lincoln, Omaha, and York were affected in varying degree.

In New Mexico the storm appeared to be subsiding. At Amarillo, Tex., Mrs. Cornelius Vanderbilt, Jr., was compelled to abandon her motor car in favor of the train in order to meet her husband at Albuquerque, N. Mex. It was too dusty to drive.

In western Kansas work in listing soil—to prevent dust storms—was halted because the atmosphere was too suffocating to permit outside activity.

DUST VICTIMS PRAY THRICE DAILY FOR RAIN

GUYMON, OKLA., April 10.—Dust-choked Guymon Methodists lifted their voices in prayer today, asking for rain and the end of the silt storms which have swept the area for weeks without abating.

Led by the Reverend R. L. Wells, the Methodists will meet three times daily until rain comes, gathering at the homes of the various members morning, noon, and afternoon.

THE COTTON-PROCESSING TAX

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a resolution of the General Assembly of the State of North Carolina, asking for repeal of the processing tax. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution of the General Assembly of the State of North Carolina asking for repeal of the processing tax:

Resolution 37

H. R. 1040, a joint resolution memorializing Congress to eliminate the cotton-processing tax

Whereas, it is of vital interest to all of our citizens, including particularly the farmer, the laborer, the merchant, and the manufacturer, to prevent the threatened total collapse of the great textile industry, and to restore it to a position of strength, thus enabling it to purchase cotton from the farmer and to continue its manufacture so that labor may be employed; and

Whereas experience has demonstrated that the cotton-processing tax places an additional burden upon the increased cost of the manufactured product to an extent that is rapidly and with certainty destroying the domestic market for textiles, inevitably preventing a demand for the finished product as well as the raw cotton which the farmer must sell in order to exist, and for labor both in the fields and in the factories, with consequent loss to the industry, the merchant, the banker, and the State and Federal Government in the matter of taxes; and

Whereas we recognize as essential and just that compensation be paid the cotton farmer for the reduction and loss of cotton under regulations by the Government, and heartily approve the salutary measures adopted to assist in restoring and maintaining the price level of cotton; yet, we also recognize that it is not logical or just, and it is not wise statesmanship to destroy a great industry upon which so large a part of our population depends for a livelihood, in an effort to carry out these measures, particularly when it is not necessary to do so, and when other less prejudicial measures, with equally beneficial results may be adopted in order to provide the funds now raised by the cotton-processing tax; that the amount necessary for these purposes should be raised, but not by the burdensome and discriminatory cotton-processing tax; that the sum necessary to carry out said purposes should be paid from the general fund or the fund appropriated for relief, and in this way accomplish the same great end, but by general distribution of the burden; and

Whereas the cotton-processing tax adds an enormous burden amounting to at least 40 percent of mill pay rolls on the mills, which cannot pass the tax along to the consumer; it adds 8 to 15 percent to the costs of inventories in times of great financial stress; it is unjust and indefensible in that it is in fact a sales tax without the virtue of universal application: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring):

SECTION 1. That our Representatives and Senators in Congress be, and they are hereby, requested to urge the Congress of the United States to secure the repeal at once of the cotton-processing tax for the aforesaid reasons.

SEC. 2. That copies of this resolution be transmitted by the secretary of the State of North Carolina to the President of the United States, the Secretary of Agriculture, and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of North Carolina.

SEC. 3. This resolution shall be in full force and effect from and after its ratification.

In the general assembly, read three times, and ratified, this the 10th day of April 1935.

R. G. JOHNSON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
A. H. GRAHAM,
President of the Senate.

Examined and found correct.

MITCHELL (for committee).

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA, DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

I, Stacey W. Wade, secretary of state of the State of North Carolina, do hereby certify the foregoing and attached four sheets to be a true copy from the records of this office.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my official seal.

Done in office at Raleigh, this 10th day of April, in the year of our Lord 1935.

STACEY W. WADE,
Secretary of State.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, in this morning's paper is printed an article wherein the national commander of the Grand Army of the Republic states that pensions should be granted by the Federal Government to the 3,000 Confederate veterans who are now alive. May I say to the Members of the House that as a Member from Massachusetts, I will be only too proud and happy to introduce such a bill and hope the Congress will pass a bill providing for the pensioning of these 3,000 Confederate veterans, whose sons fought with us on the battlefields of France.

INCOME-TAX PUBLICITY

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 6359) to amend certain provisions relating to publicity of certain statements of income and ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6359) to repeal certain provisions relating to publicity of certain statements of income, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the text of the bill, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following:

amended to read as follows:

"(b) (1) All income returns filed under this title for any taxable year beginning after December 31, 1934 (or copies thereof, if so prescribed by regulations made under this subsection), shall be open to inspection by any official, body, or commission, lawfully charged with the administration of any State tax law, if the inspection is for the purpose of such administration or for the purpose of obtaining information to be furnished to local taxing authorities as provided in paragraph (2). The inspection shall be permitted only upon written request of the governor of such State, designating the representative of such official, body, or commission to make the inspection on behalf of such official, body, or commission. The inspection shall be made in such manner, and at such times and places, as shall be prescribed by regulations made by the Commissioner with the approval of the Secretary.

"(2) Any information thus secured by any official, body, or commission of any State may be used only for the administration of the tax laws of such State, except that upon written request of the governor of such State any such information may be furnished to any official, body, or commission of any political subdivision of such State, lawfully charged with the administration of the tax laws of such political subdivision, but may be furnished only for the purpose of, and may be used only for, the administration of such tax laws. Any officer, employee, or agent of any State or political subdivision, who divulges (except as authorized in this subsection, or when called upon to testify in any judicial or administrative proceeding to which the State or political subdivision, or such State or local official, body, or commission, as such, is a party) any information acquired by him through an inspection permitted him or another under this subsection shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall upon conviction be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000, or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or both."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the title of the bill, and agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6359) to repeal certain provisions relating to publicity of certain statements of income, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report as to each of such amendments, namely:

The amendment of the Senate to the text of the bill, like the House bill, repeals section 55 (b) of the Revenue Act of 1934 (the so-called "pink slip" provision) but also adds a new provision which opens income returns filed under the Revenue Act of 1934 to the examination of any official, body, or commission of a State or political subdivision thereof charged with the administration of State or local tax laws. Such examination is to be made only while engaged in the performance of official duties. The manner of examination is to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. The information thus secured may be used only in connection with the administration of State or local tax laws. Any officer or employee who divulges, except in performance of official duties or except when called upon to testify in any court or official proceedings any information acquired by him through examination of the returns, is subject to a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $1,000.

The conference agreement retains the repeal of the "pink slip" provision contained in the House bill and the Senate amendment.

The conference agreement makes open to inspection, to the extent hereinafter described, income returns filed under the Revenue Act of 1934 which are made for any taxable year beginning after December 31, 1934, except that regulations may confine such inspection to copies thereof. The inspection may be made only by an official, body, or commission lawfully charged with the administration of any State tax law. Inspection is permitted only if made for the purpose of the administration of such State tax law or for the purpose of furnishing information to local taxing authorities as hereinafter described. Inspection may be made only upon written request of the Governor of the State, and he must designate the person to perform the act on behalf of the State taxing authority. Specific power is given the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to prescribe regulations relating to the time, place, and manner of the inspection. Paragraph (2) of the conference agreement permits the use of information secured from an inspection only for the administration of the State tax laws, except that upon the request of the Governor the taxing authority of a political subdivision may, for the purpose only of administering its local tax law, be furnished information secured by the State taxing authority, and except that on like request the State taxing authority may make the inspection for the purpose of securing information which may be furnished to and used by the local taxing authority but only for administering the local tax law. A State or local officer (whether or not connected with a taxing authority) who divulges any information acquired by him through an inspection permitted him or another under the proposed subsection is liable to a criminal penalty. An exception to this provision authorizes divulging such information but only for the official purposes permitted under the subsection or only when the person having the information is called upon to testify in a judicial or administrative proceeding to which the State, the political subdivision, or the taxing authority is a party. The conference agreement fixes the same penalty for violation of the subsection as is provided under existing law in cases of unlawful disclosure of information secured from an income return.

The Senate amended the title of the bill to conform to the amendment to the text, and the House recedes.

R. L. DOUGHTON,
SAM. B. HILL,
THOS. H. CULLEN,
ALLEN T. TREADWAY,
ISAAC BACHARACH,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, the Senate passed the bill (H. R. 6359) introduced by me with an amendment. Originally the bill simply called for the repeal of section 55 (b) of the Revenue Act of 1934, known as the "pink slip" provision. This is a unanimous report of the conference committee.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman please tell us just what the changes in the present conference report are over what was in the bill as passed by the House originally?

Mr. DOUGHTON. They adopted in the Senate what was known as the Costigan amendment with which I suppose the House Members are familiar, providing that income-tax returns shall be open to inspection by the local taxing authorities of the various States; that is, not only by the States, but by the taxing authorities of the subdivisions thereof. There was considerable objection to inserting a provision that would open this matter up in that way and there was objection also by the Treasury Department. They stated that while they had no objection to the principle involved in the proposed amendment, it was impracticable of enforcement and they also stated that it would interfere with the administration of the income-tax law. For instance, they stated that the returns were required to come to Washington soon after they were filed in the various States and if they were called upon by the tax authorities of the various States to furnish these returns when the Bureau of Internal Revenue needed them they might be accused of not cooperating because of the delay.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman tell us what was agreed upon in conference?

Mr. DOUGHTON. The Treasury Department stated the returns would be frequently in the field when they were called for. The change made by the conferees was a change in the Costigan amendment. The amendment to the Costigan amendment agreed to by the conferees provides that the same would go into effect next year. It is understood that the Bureau of Internal Revenue will have authority through Executive order to be issued in the process of administration requiring duplicate returns to be made or a copy of the returns to be filed.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman has been discussing the Costigan amendment, but what did the conferees agree upon? To whom are these reports or returns open?

Mr. DOUGHTON. These returns are open to the various States and only through permission granted by the States can the information be transmitted to the different taxing subdivisions of the States, the counties, and municipalities.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand it, the Governor of any State may request these tax returns?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes. He may grant opportunity for an inspection of the tax returns.

Mr. SNELL. Who else besides the Governor of my State, for instance, could request these returns for inspection?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Any official taxing authority at the request of the Governor, not directly, but through the Governor.

Mr. SNELL. A town assessor in my town could go to the Governor and ask him to get the returns of any man who made an income-tax return?

Mr. DOUGHTON. The municipal assessor could ask the Governor to have the State taxing authority do that; then the State taxing authority would relay that on to the local authority.

Mr. SNELL. Then it is open to the assessors in each town in the United States?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Not directly.

Mr. SNELL. Well, indirectly?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Indirectly, for the purpose of aiding the tax assessors of the various counties in enforcing their income- and property-tax laws.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Further answering the gentleman from New York, I may say that only the State taxing officer, upon request of the Governor, has the right to see these returns.

Mr. SNELL. Then I was wrong in saying they were open to each town assessor.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Yes; but the information which the taxing officer gets from inspection of the returns may, upon the direction of the Governor, be given to the local tax officer.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. TREADWAY. As I understand the question of the gentleman from New York, he wants to know to what extent the local authority can inspect tax returns.

Mr. DOUGHTON. He cannot inspect them at all.

Mr. TREADWAY. No; but he could have done so under the Costigan amendment.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Under the Costigan amendment, yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I make just a brief reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TREADWAY. I may say, Mr. Speaker, I have been consistently opposed to the "pink slip" from the start. The Senate repealed the "pink slip", but it added the so-called "Costigan amendment", which was proposed on the floor of the Senate. The Costigan amendment would have been extremely obnoxious and impractical. It would have been obnoxious because it allowed local assessors access to the returns of the taxpayers. It would have been impractical because the reports or returns are in various localities. They may be here in Washington, they may be out in the field, or they may be in subordinate offices. For instance, in my section the office is in Boston. There are several different places where these income-tax reports may be. So the Department, as the chairman of the committee has said, felt it was impractical to carry out the provisions of the Costigan amendment; but the "pink slip" provision having been repealed by both branches, it is off the statute books.

We, therefore, were willing to accept an amendment such as is embodied in the report, which does not give a local authority power to examine the returns. The local authority, in order to make up an income-tax report may, so far as applicable to local citizens, apply to the tax commissioner of the State and the State tax commissioner to the Governor. If the Governor approves the request, he may designate some official to examine the income-tax report and report back to the local authority the necessary information to make up the local assessment. This is as far as the local man can reach the ordinary income-tax report.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. Of what value is it to a local assessor to know whether a man pays an income tax or not?

Mr. TREADWAY. I agree with that idea except to this extent. One of the conferees, Senator GEORGE, of Georgia, said in our conference that he knew that at times it was necessary for the local man to have information that would permit getting a proper assessment on property. The laws in the States vary. There may be one law in your State and another law in mine, but on the testimony and statement made by Senator GEORGE, I felt we were justified in accepting this suggestion, and so far as keeping it within the control of Federal authorities is concerned, that is amply protected.

So the intention of Congress in the repeal of the "pink slip" by both branches has been carried out. This amendment that the conferees are now submitting, to my mind, in no way vitiates the attitude we took in connection with the "pink slip."

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SABATH. In further explanation why the amendment will have value, I may say to the gentleman from New York that the original request for this amendment was made by one of the outstanding and most sincere assessors we have, Mr. John S. Clark, who communicated with me some weeks ago and requested that something should be done to enable him at times to bring about justice in connection with certain evaders of taxes, and there are many of them. It is necessary that such officials have the right and the privilege of examining the returns. Such an amendment was offered by me, but, lacking the necessary time, I was unable to explain it fully to the House, and it was not agreed to. Senator COSTIGAN offered it, but in an amended form, and it was then modified in conference. The proposal can do no harm, and in cases where it is absolutely necessary for the best interests of the people, it will give the required information to the county assessors, and I think the amendment, as now proposed, should be agreed to.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. This amendment that the conference committee has brought in places the sole responsibility, it seems, on the Governor. Why should we place this responsibility on the Governor rather than on the local taxing authorities as provided in the Costigan amendment?

Mr. DOUGHTON. In response to the gentleman, I may say that, so far as I am concerned, I did not see any serious difficulty or objection to letting the local taxing authorities have the right to inspect the returns, but there was considerable objection voiced in the conference.

Mr. McFARLANE. What was that objection?

Mr. DOUGHTON. The gentleman from Massachusetts may be able to tell the gentleman better than myself, but it was thought that the purpose sought could be accomplished just as successfully by agreeing to the language contained in the conference report. Of course, I realize there are a number of honest and intelligent people like my friend the gentleman from Texas who believe in the widest and fullest publicity.

Mr. McFARLANE. Absolutely.

Mr. DOUGHTON. But the House went on record and voted to repeal the publicity provision of the law. Then when it went to the Senate the Senate amended it, making these returns available to various taxing authorities under the jurisdiction of the various States, and in conference the report, as agreed upon, was the best we were able to get; and I believe it will accomplish the purpose sought; and, moreover, I may say that I have received a letter from the Commissioner of Revenue of the State of North Carolina, a very able man with regard to tax matters and an expert on taxation, who stated that much benefit would come from the purposes sought to be accomplished by the Costigan amendment; and I believe that the amendment is really helpful to the bill as it passed the House; and so far as I am concerned I would acquiesce in the Costigan amendment as written; but a majority of the conferees were of a different opinion.

Mr. McFARLANE. The amendment is all right, but it does not go far enough.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. As the Chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means knows, my interest is to prohibit general publicity. In this conference report you provide for certain tax officials to become acquainted with the information in the tax returns.

Have you provided that these officials gaining this information may not give it out?

Mr. DOUGHTON. We have provided for a fine and imprisonment if they do.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I favored the repeal of the "pink slip", but I want to ask the gentleman this question: Is the individual who goes there at the instance of the Governor to make the investigation someone directly connected with the tax authorities either of the State or the county?

Mr. DOUGHTON. The Governor of the State designates the person to get the information, and he transmits it to the local authority.

Mr. RANDOLPH. It is within his discretion as to whom he will designate?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. This amendment does not provide for the procuring of information by the taxing officials of the District of Columbia.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The District of Columbia does not have any income-tax law.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. It will have under the measure which we have under consideration.

Mr. DOUGHTON. After that is enacted the gentleman can introduce a bill to meet that situation.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The conference report was agreed to.

AIR MAIL CONTRACTS

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 181, a privileged report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 181

Resolved, That the Postmaster General is hereby directed to furnish to the House of Representatives as soon as possible full and detailed information showing:

The names of all persons, companies, and corporations which submitted bids for air mail contracts since June 12, 1934;

The name of those to whom air mail contracts were awarded;

A list of all the stockholders holding more than 5 percent of the capital stock of each such company or corporation;

A list of the officers and directors thereof;

A statement covering the financial set-up, including a list of assets and liabilities of each company or corporation; and

The original amount paid for its stock, whether paid in cash, and if not paid in cash, a statement for what such stock was issued.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the report be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the report be read. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Report No. 666

The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the resolution (H. Res. 181) directing the Postmaster General to furnish certain information to the House of Representatives, having had the same under consideration, report it back to the House and recommend that the resolution do not pass.

The committee now has in its possession the information called for in House Resolution 181.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, this information was requested by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MAAS] and relates to the reorganization of air transport companies who hold air mail contracts.

We secured the information requested by the resolution. I have discussed it with the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MAAS] and it is agreeable to him that this information be referred to the Post Office Committee, where it will be considered and where the gentleman from Minnesota will be given an opportunity to review it. If it is in order, I would like to have the information returned to the Post Office Committee of the House for further consideration.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. Do I understand that this is agreeable to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MAAS]?

Mr. MEAD. Yes; I have discussed it with him, and I told him that I would bring it up in the House this morning, and that the information would be at his command.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. Did the gentleman inform my colleague that it would be brought up today?

Mr. MEAD. Yes; I told him I would bring it up immediately after the reading of the Journal, and I also told him of the nature of the information.

Mr. RICH. Does the gentleman believe that that is a proper course of procedure—to keep this in committee without making a publication to the world of the affairs of these airplane companies unless there is something wrong with them?

Mr. MEAD. There is not anything wrong with that; this information can be given to the press when the annual reports are made by the Post Office Department in accordance with law.

Mr. BACON. Then this information will be available to any other Member of the House when he wants it?

Mr. MEAD. Yes; but, in view of the fact that it is agreeable to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MAAS], we thought it should be referred to the Post Office Committee and then rereferred to the Subcommittee on Air Mail.

Mr. Speaker, I want this information available to the Post Office Committee; and with that in mind, I move that the report be adopted and that the resolution be laid upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

SOCIAL-SECURITY LEGISLATION

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 197, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 197

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of H. R. 7260, a bill to provide for the general welfare by establishing a system of Federal old-age benefits, and so forth. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 20 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Ways and Means, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY]. All I can say at this time is that this is a wide open rule, as open as any rule ever presented to the House. It permits amendment under the rules of the House. No rule was ever presented to the House that was more open.

I reserve the remainder of my time, and yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GREENWOOD].

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege, and, if the Chair please, to the privilege of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MONAGHAN. The point of order I wish to make is this. I read in the rules that the rights of the House must be safeguarded as to its integrity, safety, and efficiency, and this matter of social security is one of the most important subjects that will come before this House during this whole session of Congress.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not addressing himself to the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana will please state his question of privilege.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I am stating the point of order. It affects the dignity of this House to safeguard the rights of its Members to speak upon a matter in which they have vitally concerned themselves. That is a matter of paramount importance and constitutional importance, and the right cannot even be infringed by civil officers.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not stating a question of personal privilege, or a matter involving the privilege of the House.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the question of the privilege of the House must be raised by resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey is correct.

Mr. BLANTON. But that does not apply to the matter of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. A matter of the privilege of the House must be raised by resolution. The Chair understood the gentleman from Montana to raise a question of the privileges of the House.

Mr. MONAGHAN. And a matter of personal privilege. I said also the privilege of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his question of personal privilege.

Mr. MONAGHAN. I read from rule IX:

Questions of privilege shall be, first, those affecting the rights of the House collectively, its safety, dignity, and the integrity of its proceedings.

Under the question of personal privilege I cite the integrity of the proceedings of the House. I cannot see that this rule adequately protects this House so far as giving it and the public adequate information as to the rule.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not stating a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken. The gentleman will state the question of personal privilege.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Then I appeal from the decision of the Chair, if any has been made.

The SPEAKER. But the Chair has not made any ruling. The Chair is simply seeking to have the question of personal privilege stated by the gentleman.

Mr. MONAGHAN. I have stated it.

The SPEAKER. What is it?

Mr. MONAGHAN. This matter of social security is one in which I am vitally interested and have interested myself from my first session in Congress, and I have interested myself on this rule to the extent of circularizing every Member of the House. I am not permitted to speak upon it. It is my constitutional right that my constituents may be heard here. That is denied.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not stating a question of personal privilege, and I move that his remarks be stricken from the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Permit the Chair to rule.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I should like to continue, if I shall not be interrupted.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman cannot make an argument at this time. He must succinctly state his question of personal privilege.

Mr. MONAGHAN. I will state it.

The SPEAKER. Without accompanying it with an argument at this time.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Am I not permitted to argue the point of order?

The SPEAKER. It is necessary for the gentleman first to state his question of personal privilege as a basis for any argument that he may desire to submit. The Chair has no desire other than to see that the gentleman and every Member of the House is protected under the rules. The rules provide that a gentleman who raises a question of personal privilege must first state his question before he proceeds to argue with reference to it.

Mr. MONAGHAN. I have asked for time from the minority and the majority——

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. The gentleman is not stating a question of personal privilege.

Mr. MONAGHAN. How could I state my question of personal privilege if I do not state the right that has been denied me? I maintain that the right of any Member should be safeguarded to speak upon any question in which he has vitally interested himself at every session of the Congress. By reason of the fact that the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] will not assign me time, and I am not assigned time by the minority, and my unanimous-consent request is denied, my personal privilege——

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Montana, under the guise of raising a question of personal privilege, is making a speech to his constituents in behalf of the Townsend plan.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. The gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] has no right to make that statement.

The SPEAKER. The rules provide that a Member may rise to a question of personal privilege where his rights, reputation, and conduct individually, in his representative capacity, is assailed or reflected upon. The Chair fails to see where the gentleman has presented a question of personal privilege which will bring himself within that rule. The rules provide for the conduct of the business of the House——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The rules are necessary——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask that the improper words of the gentleman from New York referring to the remarks of the gentleman from Montana as "a demagogic speech" be taken down——

The SPEAKER. The Chair is in the midst of a ruling. The Chair hopes the gentleman will respect the Chair until he finishes with his statement.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to ask that the gentleman's improper words be taken down, and do not want to lose that right——

The SPEAKER. The Chair is in the midst of a ruling. The Chair trusts the gentleman from Texas will refrain from interruption until the Chair has concluded.

Mr. BLANTON. I will.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was about to state to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MONAGHAN] that these rules have been adopted for the proper conduct of the business of the House. They provide the method of procedure. If this rule is adopted the gentleman may, of course, appeal to those who have charge of the time for time, but there are 435 Members of the House, and the gentleman must appreciate, as the Chair does, that it is impossible for those gentlemen to yield to everyone. However, the Chair is very sure that opportunity will be afforded the gentleman sometime during the discussion of the bill to express his views.

The Chair fails to see where the gentleman has been denied any right that has not been denied to every Member of this House. The gentleman has his right of appeal to get time, as the Chair stated, if this rule is adopted. If the rule is not adopted and the bill is taken up, then the gentleman may proceed under the rules of the House. The Chair fails to see where the gentleman has raised a question of personal privilege.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order, unless the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] withdraws the word "demagogic", that the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] that the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MONAGHAN] was making "a demagogic speech" is out of order. It attributes improper motives to the gentleman from Montana, who, I think, is earnest and sincere, and I ask that those words, "a demagogic speech", be taken down, as used by the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], unless the gentleman sees fit to withdraw them.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Well, I did not pronounce it just that way, but I have no intention of withdrawing it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that those words embracing "demagogic" be taken down, because while he and I do not agree on this bill, I think the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MONAGHAN] is sincere and in earnest in his declaration. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman requests that the words of the gentleman from New York be taken down.

The Clerk will report the words.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I wonder if the request to take down the gentleman's words does not come too late?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no; it does not. I made it in due order.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, in order to save time and to get down to the business of the House, and without relinquishing any of my private opinions, I withdraw the word I used.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I therefore withdraw my request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, this resolution provides for what is commonly known as a "wide open" rule for the consideration of the so-called "social security bill." The rule provides for 20 hours of general debate to be confined to the bill and is wide open for all amendments that are germane that any Member may wish to offer. We think the importance of this legislation calls for a rule of this liberality.

I want to congratulate the Ways and Means Committee on the presentation of this bill after many days of consideration. It is a great and wonderful step in advance providing for the security of old age, for the security of motherhood and of childhood. We have learned many lessons from the depression, among them that in a land of surpluses, in a land of plenty, where we raise a surplus of foodstuffs, thousands if not millions are hungry; that in a land where we produce a surplus of wool, cotton, and other material for clothing, many are unclothed; that in a land where we produce a surplus of fuel, coal, oil, and electric power, many are cold and homes are unheated. From this depression we have learned that there must be new formulas for the security of humanity. After all, the supreme purpose of government is the protection of its citizens and the protection of humanity.

This legislation is a wonderful step in advance along the line of security. It may not go as far as some would like, but certainly it is a movement in the right direction as an initial step.

The rule provides that anyone who has an amendment they believe will improve the details of this legislation may offer it and will have ample opportunity and time in which to discuss it.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I yield.

Mr. COX. The effect of the proposed rule is to give a privileged status to the bill and to make possible its consideration at this time.

Mr. GREENWOOD. That is all.

Mr. COX. And in that it provides for 20 hours' general debate it enlarges the privileges of the Members rather than restricts them.

Mr. GREENWOOD. That is true. I thank the gentleman for his contribution. It is one of the most liberal rules I have ever seen.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. How long will we be permitted to discuss the rule before the previous question will be ordered on the rule?

Mr. GREENWOOD. The rules of the House provide for 1 hour of debate on the rule.

Mr. McFARLANE. I do not so read it in the rule.

Mr. GREENWOOD. That is the rule of the House touching this matter, as I understand it.

Mr. McFARLANE. Another question, if the gentleman will permit. The Parliamentarian has had some 19 or 20 amendments submitted to him but he has not passed upon them. If this rule is adopted, can the gentleman state whether or not the different measures that have been discussed before the country would be germane to the bill?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Why, certainly the gentleman cannot state that; that is the province of the Speaker and the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union when the amendment is offered and after he knows what it is.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. In its ultimate finality it is within the control of the House, because even though the Speaker rules, the House can pass on all rulings. Is not that true?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I yield.

Mr. TRUAX. If this rule is adopted, may the so-called "Townsend plan" be offered as a substitute?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I have no reason to believe it would not be germane.

Mr. TRUAX. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. GREENWOOD. But I am not the Speaker of the House, nor am I the Parliamentarian. Perhaps the gentleman from Ohio knows as much about it as I do.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I yield.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. A few moments ago the Speaker of the House in ruling on a point of order stated that he felt sure the gentleman from Montana would be able to get time in the discussion of this bill. The Rules Committee brings out a rule dividing the time equally between the minority and the majority.

Mr. GREENWOOD. That is always customary, and there is nothing unusual about that.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Has the Rules Committee ever thought of the injustice of that, in this respect: There are three times as many Democratic Members in the House as Republicans, yet Republicans are given an equal amount of time.

Mr. GREENWOOD. The time has always been divided between the majority and the minority not with the idea of politics, but that has been the custom of the House ever since I have been a Member of the House. This rule is no different from every other rule in that respect.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I yield.

Mr. RICH. When mention was made of the Townsend plan being germane under this rule, did the gentleman mean the plan by which $200 a month was to be paid people over a certain age on the condition that they spend it during the month, that foolish, ridiculous, obnoxious bill?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I do not know what the gentleman may mean or what any man may have in the back of his head, but when the appropriate time comes, the gentleman can propound the parliamentary inquiry to the Speaker.

Also in connection with the purposes of this legislation I am sure we all appreciate that we live in a machine age, an age of great invention; and unless we are going to correct this position, under the laws of invention, the monopoly that is granted and the principal profits that come from an invention are going to accrue to the management of industry and not be divided as an appanage to those who work with their hands. The invention of machinery crowds out hundreds and thousands of men and women who labor with their hands. We know that the future holds in store much unemployment and its attendant distress, especially unemployment in old age, and we may as well make this step now looking forward to that future date so that the advantages that accrue from the machine and this age of discovery in which we live shall take care of the people displaced. All our people must be taken care of under legislation of this character, and I say that the bill is a wonderful step in advance.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I yield.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Speaking of the machine age, if the 48 States of the Union would shorten hours of labor we could meet the threat of the machine age, and that is the only way in which we can meet it.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I will agree with the gentleman from New York that the shortening of hours of labor would be very beneficial, but nevertheless there will always be that distress of old age; there will always be the necessity for assistance to be rendered to motherhood and childhood. I believe it is our duty as a nation of great wealth and of great surpluses to provide a scheme of government that through the years will build up the necessary reserves to provide for security in old age, of motherhood, and of childhood. This bill, in my opinion, is a step in the right direction.

Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the Ways and Means Committee for the care with which this bill has been prepared and for the work they have performed. I trust that the House will sustain the Committee by voting favorably on this rule in order that we may have full consideration and full opportunity for amendment of this bill.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. May I make the suggestion that if the membership will read the report of the committee, they will find it is most instructive and explanatory of the measure.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to myself.

Mr. Speaker, the Rules Committee has given an open rule to the security bill, giving the House an opportunity to amend the bill when it comes before this body.

The bill provides that the Federal Government pay one-half of the cost of State old-age pensions, with a Federal limit of $15 per month to one person. You will admit that this is by no means a princely sum and there is grave doubt as to the constitutionality of part of the bill; the Government, in the minds of many, has not the power to enforce social insurance under the guise of a tax. Again, no credit is allowed for the private pension funds set up by individual employers. The bill is, to say the least, loosely drawn and will probably reach the courts. I, however, propose to vote for the rule.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MOTT].

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, although this bill, the administration's old-age pension bill, comes into the House under an ostensibly open rule, yet insofar as that rule permits the administration bill to be amended in the way that many Members of the House would like to see it amended, this rule is not an open rule at all. It is to all practical intents and purposes virtually a gag rule, and I desire to try to show you, in the short time allotted for discussion on the rule, just why it is a gag rule.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOTT. I have only 5 minutes on the rule, and I would appreciate it if the gentleman would allow me to finish my statement.

Mr. COX. Is the gentleman in favor of liberalizing the rules of the House?

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield. I am sorry, but the gentleman must realize that my time is too limited to yield at this point for questions if I am to conclude my own statement within the time.

Mr. Speaker, it is generally conceded, and I have consulted several of the best parliamentarians in the House on the point, that under a general open rule of the House no such old-age pension plan as that embraced in the Lundeen bill or in the revised McGroarty bill may be offered by way of amendment as a substitute to section 1 of the pending bill, which is the old-age-pension feature of the President's economic-security bill, which bill we are now about to consider under this rule.

Now, let me say frankly at the outset that the only part of the President's economic-security bill that I am very greatly interested in for the moment, or that many Members are very greatly interested in, is section 1 of that bill, which contains the old-age-pensions provisions. I dare say not 2 percent of the people of the United States either know or care a great deal about any part of this administration bill, except the old-age-pension part of it, but, on the other hand, I venture to say that 90 percent of the people of the United States do know and do care about the old-age-pension features of it and that they are very much interested in knowing whether or not we intend at this session of Congress to give to them an adequate old-age-pension bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, while I intend to confine my remarks at this stage to the rule itself, and not to the bill reported in under the rule, I desire to say in this connection that the old-age pension provided in the administration bill is not an adequate old-age pension and that most of the membership of the House freely admit that it is not adequate. I doubt very much whether there will be any serious contention in the debate which is to follow the disposition of this rule that the pension here proposed is an adequate old-age pension. Furthermore, few people outside of the Congress believe this to be an adequate pension. Since the convening of the present Congress I have replied to more than 9,000 letters inquiring about and commenting upon the old-age-pension provision of the administration bill, but I have yet to receive a single letter in which the writer expressed the opinion that the pension here proposed is adequate.

Please do not misunderstand me. I am not for the purpose of the debate on the rule criticizing the bill itself. What criticism I may have for it I shall reserve for debate upon the bill. But I am telling you what the people you yourselves represent think about it, for the purpose of urging upon you the liberalization of the rule, so that what your constituents have asked for in the way of an old-age pension may at least be considered and debated under the rule.

Mr. Speaker, there are millions of people in this country who in good faith have petitioned the Congress to consider and discuss and to decide upon the merits of certain old-age-pension plans which they believe to be solutions to the old-age-pension problem. It is said that 20,000,000 people have signed petitions asking Congress to consider the so-called "Townsend plan", which is now before the Congress in the shape of a new bill known as the revised McGroarty bill. It is reported also that more than a million people have by the similar orderly method of petition prayed Congress to consider the Lundeen bill, which has been favorably reported to the House by the Committee on Labor. Is this body, the duly constituted representatives of the people and the law-making authority of the people, going to deny completely these petitions of the people?

The Constitution of the United States guarantees to its people the right of petition to the proper authority, which in this case is the Congress of the United States, and that right presupposes and carries with it the right to have their orderly petitions properly considered and passed upon by the Congress in an orderly manner. I am not contending that you must grant those petitions by enacting their proposals into law, because to say that would be to deny to Congress the right to legislate as the representatives of the whole people. But I do say to you that you have no right to refuse to allow the legislation prayed for in those petitions to be considered on the floor of this House. I do say that you have no right, figuratively speaking, to throw those petitions in the waste basket. And finally I say that although you may have the legal right you have no moral right to adopt any rule today which will render it impossible for the House to consider and act upon either the revised McGroarty bill, the Lundeen bill, or any other old-age-pension bill now before Congress which proposes a different old-age-pension plan than that proposed in the President's bill. And that, Mr. Speaker, is precisely what the majority of this House will do if it adopts this rule.

The other bills to which I have referred are tax bills, and that is the reason why they cannot be offered as amendments or substitutes for section 1 of the pending bill, under the supposedly open rule which you are now proposing to adopt. Under this rule all tax bills must be held to be not germane to section 1 because section 1 contains no tax provision. The revised McGroarty bill is a tax bill providing, among other things, for a 2-percent transaction tax for the purpose of financing the pension provided for in the bill. The Lundeen bill is also a tax bill. All the other old-age-pension bills now pending before Congress are tax bills, and this rule will shut them all out from any consideration whatever.

Mr. Speaker, I trust the point I make is clear to everyone—that under the general rules of the House and under this particular rule—no one will be allowed to offer any other old-age plan as a substitute to section 1 of the administration bill which, of course, is the only bill before the House for consideration under the rule. I have no right to say to Members how they shall vote for any of these other bills if they are offered, but I think I have a right to insist that the Rules Committee ought to give the Membership of the House an opportunity to consider those other plans and to debate them, and, if they are satisfied with one of the other plans they ought to have the right to substitute it for the old-age-pension provision of this administration bill.

The only way that that can be done, and the only way that this House will have any opportunity whatever of considering any other old-age-pension plan except the particular plan specified in the pending bill, is to vote down the previous question on the rule and then amend the rule so as to provide that any other old-age-pension plan, together with any other system or scheme of raising revenue to finance it, may be offered by way of amendment to section 1 of this bill. Gentlemen will have an opportunity to do this by simply voting down the previous question and amending the rule, or by voting down the rule itself and requiring the Rules Committee to bring in a new rule. If you refuse to do that, then by your vote you will declare to your colleagues and to the country that you have prevented and forbidden consideration and debate in this House upon any other kind or type of old-age-pension bill except the specific plan provided in the pending bill, which, in the opinion of the majority of the Members here, is altogether inadequate and with which the country as a whole is not satisfied. [Applause.]

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Montana rise?

Mr. MONAGHAN. For the purpose of submitting a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Is not the statement that was made by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MOTT] correct, that if this rule passes, then only one particular plan, the plan that we now have under discussion, may be passed upon by the Congress?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not in position to answer that parliamentary inquiry. That is a matter which will come up subsequently under the rules of the House. The Chair would not seek to anticipate what the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole may rule or what the Committee itself may do. The Chair feels very certain that the Chairman of the Committee will be governed, as all chairmen of committees are, by the rules and precedents of the House. Certainly the Chair would not anticipate his ruling; and in addition to this, the Chair cannot pass upon any particular amendment until it has been presented in all its phases.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a unanimous-consent request. All those who spoke on the river and harbor bill, which we considered on the 9th, were given 3 legislative days to extend their remarks. I have such permission, but I desire to include in the extension certain extracts from the report of the Chief of Engineers and other Government agencies in reference to a certain project in the bill, and I ask unanimous consent that I may include them as a part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

SOCIAL-SECURITY BILL

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON].

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not think this legislation should have been accompanied by a special rule——

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. KNUTSON. If the gentleman please, I have only 5 minutes.

Bringing in this bill under a special rule is a reflection upon you Democrats.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, will my colleague yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I always yield to my chairman.

Mr. DOUGHTON. We were advised by what we considered good parliamentary authority that this is the only way by which the bill could be considered. We were advised that it is not privileged and could only come in under a rule. Apparently, the gentleman would not want it considered at all.

Mr. KNUTSON. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shows there are 319 Democrats in the House, 103 Republicans, 7 Progressives, and 3 Farmer-Laborites. In other words, you have three times as many Members as the three other parties combined [applause], but you cannot be trusted to pass upon a measure of this kind without a gag rule. [Laughter.] Now, applaud that. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONAGHAN and Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. KNUTSON. To my good friend from Montana, who started the fireworks.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Does not the gentleman feel that my rights in this House have been infringed when I have been refused the right to express myself on this, the most important part of the whole program, the rule under which the bill will be considered?

Mr. KNUTSON. Technically, no; morally, yes. [Laughter and applause.]

When we were in control we very rarely brought legislation in under a gag rule. [Laughter.] That is all right, but the RECORD will bear me out. I notice that the proponents of this rule are going to some pains to explain to you that this is an open rule.

Now, do not deceive yourselves. If you adopt this rule, you vote to tie your hands so that you cannot substitute any provisions for section 1 that provides for raising the money through taxation.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. The gentleman is complaining because this measure is brought in under a rule. Will he please say how in the world it could be considered without a rule? To show you how absolutely absurd——

Mr. KNUTSON. I cannot yield for a speech. If the gentleman wants to propound a question, all right.

Mr. WARREN. I want to propound a question.

Mr. KNUTSON. I think you are taking too much of my time, and I refuse to yield further.

Mr. WARREN. It could only come up, otherwise, on Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I cannot yield for a statement.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. KNUTSON. For a question, yes; but not a statement.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Could we not adopt the same procedure we followed when we considered the bonus bill? You then brought in a special rule for the Patman bill and the Andrews bill, so that we could amend the Vinson bill by substituting those two bills. Why do you not do the same thing here?

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I wish to inquire as to the gentleman's opinion of whether we could, under this rule, substitute H. R. 2827, or the McGroarty bill.

Mr. KNUTSON. Is H. R. 2827 the gentleman's bill?

Mr. LUNDEEN. H. R. 2827 is the Lundeen bill.

Mr. KNUTSON. No; you cannot.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. If we did not have a rule there would be just 1 hour of debate under the rules of the House, whereas under the rule there is 20 hours of debate.

Mr. KNUTSON. Why could you not bring in a rule to give us 20 hours of debate and let it go at that?

As I look into your faces on this side you appear to me like intelligent people. You look as though you can be trusted, but evidently your leaders feel that you cannot be trusted, and perhaps they know you better than I do. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, just to show how absolutely ridiculous and fallacious the argument made by the gentleman from Minnesota is I call attention of the House to this fact: He is complaining of the wide-open rule brought out on this occasion. Had there been no rule this bill would have been considered on some Calendar Wednesday, and there would have been only 1 hour of general debate on each side on the whole subject. The gentleman from Minnesota knows that, and that shows how entirely ridiculous his argument is. His reason for opposing this rule is absurd on its face.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. I yield.

Mr. MONAGHAN. I wonder how the length of debate would give us a better bill.

Mr. WARREN. The same rules of germaneness would apply then as now.

Mr. MONAGHAN. How about the bonus bill?

Mr. WARREN. That was brought in under a rule.

Mr. MONAGHAN. But a very much more liberal rule than this.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO].

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, the press of the Nation has heralded this rule as wide open. I agree that it is a wide-open rule technically, but from a practical standpoint it is a rule which accomplishes the same purpose of a stringent gag rule. It prevents this House from discussing and passing on genuine social-security plans.

The argument has been raised here that legislation on social security is just as important, if not more important, than that of the soldiers' bonus. I agree with that statement. The rule on the soldiers' bonus provided that the House could vote for either the Vinson plan, the Patman plan, or the Andrews plan. The Rules Committee brought in a special rule giving the Membership the right to offer any of these plans as amendments in the Committee of the Whole or in the House with two motions to recommit.

Why should not a special rule be adopted, providing the same procedure for this legislation, which is the most important long-range legislation presented before this House in 25 years?

Nobody can deny that the Lundeen bill may be ruled out on a point of order on the ground that it is not germane under this trick rule. Nobody can deny that it will also be argued that the Townsend old-age plan is not germane. As far as the Townsend plan is concerned it may be ruled out because it provides for taxation. It may be held not to be germane because it provides for revenue raising, and the Doughton bill before us has no revenue-raising provisions for Federal old-age provisions. The Townsend plan may be ruled out on a further point according to the Mapes precedent in that it raises revenue by a different method than that in the bill. Why not adopt a special rule making both these plans in order.

Throughout the Nation millions of people are in favor of the McGroarty-Townsend plan, millions of people are in favor of the Lundeen workers' plan. Although I am for H. R. 2827, the Lundeen bill, known as the "workers' bill", and although I am opposed to the Townsend plan because it would impose a sales tax, which is just as bad as the payroll tax imposed under the Doughton bill. I do not care to discuss the merits of any of the plans at this time. I shall do so under general debate. However I do say that the House of Representatives should have an opportunity to vote on these plans and to deliberate on matters which are being discussed by millions of our citizens. We should vote these plans up or down and assume our responsibilities like real Representatives of the people and not dodge issues which millions of Americans have raised throughout the Nation. Their causes should be given a trial before this House and this House should be given an opportunity to pass judgment. We should not hide behind a trick rule. We should face issues squarely. That is our duty and that is why we are here. This rule, in all likelihood will preclude this House from voting on any of these plans. So when you say you are giving us a wide-open rule, you are giving us a wide-open bag; you have got this thing in the bag and you are getting away with it. [Laughter and applause.]

I propose that the only method by which we can amend this rule so as to make the Townsend plan germane and the Lundeen plan germane is to vote down the previous question and then amend this trick rule. We cannot amend this trick rule unless we vote down the previous question. If the previous question is voted down, then I shall propose the following amendment:

On page 1, line 11, after the word "rule", insert "In the consideration of the bill it shall be in order to consider as amendments the provisions of H. R. 2827 (the Lundeen) plan and of H. R. 7154 (the Townsend) plan, notwithstanding any rule of the House."

This will give a real hearing to a great portion of the American people.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield.

Mr. CONNERY. The Lundeen bill is a bill that has been reported by a committee of this House?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Exactly. The Labor Committee reported the Lundeen bill favorably. Why should not this House be given an opportunity to discuss and pass on this plan?

Mr. Speaker, you may call this "social security", you may call this a "new deal", you may call it what you please, but it is simply the same old stacked deck of cards that were sent to the laundry 2 years ago to be powdered and polished and are now being dealt out in the same old manner. You can call it "social security"; you can call it "the new deal." I say to you this is not social security, not a new deal, but it is just a new delusion. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO] has expired.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox].

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, as has been explained, this bill did not enjoy privilege. The effect of the rule is to give it a privileged status, thereby making possible consideration at this time. The rule reported and now offered to the House deprives no Member of any privilege or right which he enjoys under the general rules of the House. As a matter of fact, in providing 20 hours' general debate, it enlarges the privileges of the Membership.

It does seem to me, Mr. Speaker, most unreasonable for anyone to complain of the action of the Rules Committee in reporting this rule, especially in view of the fact that the Ways and Means Committee, asking for a rule, simply requested such rule as the Rules Committee in its judgment might see fit to grant. That committee reported a rule which preserves to the Members all rights that they enjoy under the general rules of the House.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Not now. It could not in reason be expected that the Rules Committee would have gone out of its way to the extent of seeking to liberalize the general rules of the House in order to make possible the consideration of some extreme and impossible a measure as is the Townsend plan.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LUNDEEN].

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Speaker, I agree with the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO], well stated, that the House should have an opportunity to pass on these two measures supported by millions of people in these United States. For instance, H. R. 2827, considered by a subcommittee of the Committee on Labor, and reported out, 6 to 1, by that subcommittee, should be included. I have the hearings on that bill before me in which the constitutionality of the workers' unemployment, old-age, and social-security bill is clearly upheld.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNDEEN. I yield.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I am sure the gentleman does not want to misstate the facts. The committee reported the bill 7 to 6.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I was speaking of the subcommittee when I said the vote was 6 to 1.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Well, let us get it straight.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Well, my statement is correct; the subcommittee of the Labor Committee favorably reported H. R. 2827 and the full Labor Committee reported the bill out by a majority of one.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNDEEN. I yield.

Mr. CONNERY. This bill was passed upon favorably by the Committee on Labor, and I put in for a resolution with the Rules Committee and we received no action on it.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I thank the gentleman; and I wish to say to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK] that the subcommittee reported the bill out 6 to 1, as I have already stated. The main Committee on Labor passed the bill by a majority of one, which is the vote to which the gentleman from Georgia referred.

These hearings are quite complete. There are 800 pages of testimony of economists and leaders of thought along the line of social security from all over the United States.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNDEEN. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. Did I understand the gentleman to say his bill had been reported out by the Committee on Labor?

Mr. LUNDEEN. Yes, indeed.

Mr. KNUTSON. It would be an act of discourtesy to the Committee on Labor if we refused to consider it during the consideration of this measure.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I think the gentleman is correct. I think the Committee on Labor is one of the finest committees in this House, and it has as its chairman one of the ablest and finest leaders that American labor has ever had. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNDEEN. Certainly.

Mr. CONNERY. I will say that we are used to the discourtesy to which the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] referred.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNDEEN. I yield.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Since this rule will not permit a vote either upon the Lundeen measure or the McGroarty bill, and since it has 20 hours of debate, is it not a rule that provides for "all bull" and no real bill?

Mr. LUNDEEN. I will leave that to the gentleman's own judgment. I wish to say that the thing to do, in my opinion, when the previous question is voted upon, is to vote down the previous question and throw open this rule to amendment. [Applause.] That is what we should do in this House, so that we can vote on the Townsend plan and vote it up or down, as the Members think best, and vote on this Lundeen plan—H. R. 2827—as the House thinks best, either one way or the other.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNDEEN. I yield.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Is H. R. 2827, known as the "Lundeen bill", an old-age-pension bill?

Mr. LUNDEEN. Unemployment, old-age, and social-security bill.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. But is it distinctly an old-age-pension bill, or does it pension all unemployed.

Mr. LUNDEEN. It covers the unemployed and old-age pensions.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Let us get this straight. It is not strictly an old-age-pension bill.

Mr. LUNDEEN. It is an unemployment, old-age, and social-insurance bill.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNDEEN. Yes.

Mr. TRUAX. If we vote for this rule then we preclude the consideration of the Lundeen workers' bill and the Townsend old-age bill. We shut the door against those two bills.

Mr. LUNDEEN. In my opinion we do, and that is based on the judgment of the best parliamentarians of the House of Representatives. I hope we can persuade the leaders of the majority to permit a vote on the Lundeen bill (H. R. 2827) and the Townsend bill (H. R. 7154), introduced by Representative MCGROARTY. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Sixteen minutes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MONAGHAN].

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, first, I thank the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] and say that I have the profoundest respect for him. His action in granting these 3 minutes is proof to me of what I have always thought—that he is one of the most sportsmanlike, as well as one of the most brilliant, men in the House. [Applause.]

The reason that I rise in opposition to this rule is quite simple. It is regarded generally by those who know that, even while opportunity is presented here for amendment, the amendments desired to be offered will be ruled out, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO] has so well stated, as not being germane to the bill under consideration. It is further true that there is a right to a motion to recommit, but that right goes by proper rule to the minority side of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, with the power in their hands to offer an innocuous and harmless motion and thereby defeat any bill such as the Lundeen bill or the McGroarty bill, or any other type of social-security bill.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONAGHAN. Yes; I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MOTT].

Mr. MOTT. And may I suggest that even if the minority should offer on a motion to recommit the revised McGroarty bill, it would be held not germane, the same as it would be if it were offered as an amendment to the bill, so that the right to recommit gives the people no right whatever so far as putting in a substitute for the administration bill is concerned.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONAGHAN. Yes; always, to my good friend from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. A motion to recommit is subject to amendment. I looked that up the other day. One can offer an amendment to a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Montana has expired.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman begins, will he yield for a question?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. In view of statements that have been made to the effect of a vote for the rule having the same effect as a vote against the so-called "Lundeen and McGroarty bills", what has the gentleman to say?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I cannot interpret that. That is a parliamentary question which should be addressed to the Chair.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. I thought the gentleman was a good parliamentarian.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, there has been a lot of excitement about this rule. It has been stated many times that it is a wide-open rule and that is what it is, and no one by talking from now until doomsday can convince anybody with reason that it is not. No more wide-open rule could be devised. It is just a form. The committee clerk draws it when told to bring out an open rule and that is all it is. The Ways and Means Committee, different from the time when we had up for consideration the bonus bill, left the matter entirely to the Committee on Rules. So far as the bonus bill is concerned, I might say that the Committee on Ways and Means requested the Rules Committee to make the Patman bill in order.

Why a rule? As has been said, you would never consider this legislation during this session of Congress without a rule. The bill has no privileged status. While it has partial revenue features in it, it does not come within clause 45 of rule XI which makes bills raising revenue in order. So a rule is necessary.

There has been a lot of talk here for weeks and weeks about gag rules on this measure. I am disclosing no confidence when I say that many of us, including the Speaker and myself, have stood against any gag rule for the consideration of this measure, and let me say to the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] that this is a pension bill in a great measure. I do not know whether the distinguished orator from Minnesota was ever on a pensions committee, but I have an idea that at one time he was chairman of a pensions committee. In the whole history of Congress no pension bill was ever brought in otherwise than under suspension of the rules, with 40 minutes of debate, no amendments permitted, no motion to recommit, with every rule of the House suspended. That is the way it was always brought in under Republican administration.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman said the Ways and Means Committee requested that the Patman bill be made germane to the Vinson bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. The Committee on Labor asked a rule from the Committee on Rules after favorably reporting the Lundeen bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Let me say right there that we hear a lot of criticism of the Rules Committee in the House here and we are supposed to take it. My information as to the Lundeen bill is that in the gentleman's committee a vote was taken to table the measure and that vote was 7 to 7.

Mr. CONNERY. That is correct.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Seven to seven to table it. That did not carry and one member who voted to table the measure left the room and the bill was reported out on a vote of 7 to 6. Further, I do not recall that the gentleman has ever asked me or approached the Rules Committee to give even a hearing on the Lundeen bill.

Mr. CONNERY. Does not the gentleman want me to state the situation?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I have not the time to go into that now.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman referred to me.

Mr. O'CONNOR. If I am not correct, I stand corrected.

Mr. CONNERY. Does the gentleman want me to mention private conversations we have had about the Lundeen bill?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I must be mistaken. The gentleman must be correct when he states he did mention the subject to me.

Mr. CONNERY. I have mentioned it to the gentleman three or four times. I am not going to say what the gentleman said, except there was no chance for the Lundeen bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I am perfectly willing that the Lundeen bill be made in order on this bill. I hope it is in order and I hope the Townsend plan is in order on this bill.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. I know the gentleman is a good parliamentarian. I ask the gentleman to tell the House whether or not he thinks the Lundeen bill or the Townsend plan bill, either, is germane to this bill?

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman is now asking me to go into a matter which I have not gone into. Nobody is entitled to stand on the floor of the House and say that either the Townsend plan or the Lundeen plan is not germane to this bill. The Parliamentarian has a stack of bills yet to examine. Some Member will preside as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and will pass upon these questions as they rise. Off-hand, I will say now that I think the Townsend plan is germane, although I attach little importance to my opinion because I have not sufficiently studied the bill. I hope it is, so I can vote against it. [Applause.]

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. May I also call the gentleman's attention to the fact that it is always possible to appeal from a decision of the Chair? I would call the gentleman's attention to this additional fact also, that in the matter of the bonus question we had but one bill and not, as in the present instance, a bill with several parts. The two situations are entirely different. My own personal opinion is in complete harmony with that of the distinguished gentleman from New York, that this being a bill of several parts, not one particular bill, but several bills in one, either one of those bills is in order as an additional part of this bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I hope they are.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a brief observation?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I have not time, I am sorry.

There is no man in the House for whom I hold more affection than the distinguished gentleman from Montana [Mr. MONAGHAN]. It must be remembered, however, that the tactics here today of voting down a rule, and the tactics of the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MONAGHAN] yesterday in objection to my request to have until midnight to file a rule, were against this bill. If these tactics succeed, no Townsendite, no Lundeenite, no lift-the-burden-off-the-Federal-Governmentite would ever get a chance to consider this bill.

I did not know that the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MONAGHAN] was the leader of the Townsendites. I thought my beloved friend the poet laureate of California, JOHN STEVEN MCGROARTY, had introduced the bill and led his valiant fight for the Townsend plan. I did not know until yesterday that Dr. Townsend, who is now presiding in all his dignity over this House, had selected the young admiral from Montana [laughter] to lead his forces in this battle.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Briefly.

Mr. MONAGHAN. The gentleman does know, however, that my interest in old-age pensions antedates the Townsend plan or any other plan.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I did not know that.

Mr. MONAGHAN. And that it dates back to the time when the railroad retirement bill had to be fought through Congress against the united and combined opposition of the leadership of both House and Senate.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Something has been said about an innocuous motion to recommit. Wait until you see it. The motion to recommit will be to strike out the heart of this bill. It will not be any perfunctory motion, and that motion is in the hands of the minority.

What would you have us do? Would you have us hold the N. R. A. bill, the banking bill, and other bills are germane to this bill? Would you tear up Jefferson's Manual just to suit those who have sent all this propaganda throughout the country?

Mr. MONAGHAN. If the gentleman will yield, I would not.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Under one plan only 6,000,000 people would be eligible for old-age pensions instead of 22,000,000 and we would have the spectacle of sons and daughters giving up supporting their parents and wanting the Federal Government to support them. We of the great State of New York take care of our deserving aged people, but we do not deceive and delude them. There is going to be a day of reckoning for the people who are advocating this Townsend plan when our poor, distressed, desperate people wake up to the situation and find the snare and the delusion they have been drawn into. [Applause.]

Mr. MONAGHAN. May I say to the gentleman——

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield.

Mr. MONAGHAN. There will be a day of reckoning for those advocating the delusion plan suggested.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the rules provide that a Member desiring to interrogate the Member who has the floor must first address himself to the Chair and obtain consent of the gentleman addressing the House. [Applause.] It is highly improper, although indulged in practically all the time, for a Member to rise and interrupt the Member addressing the House without first addressing the Chair and obtaining consent of the gentleman who has the floor.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. For a brief question.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. When it comes to the question of despair, does not the gentleman from New York believe that the imposition of a pay-roll tax which eventually will fall on the employees will bring greater despair than the despair the gentleman describes?

Mr. O'CONNOR. That I do not know. The gentleman from New York knows that the great Empire State has never neglected its aged and its children; and we do not have to depend upon the Federal Government to take care of our people.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. That is only so far as the State of New York goes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, we have been struggling with this problem for at least 10 days. We have done what we thought was the very best thing to do.

I have seen statements in the paper that the administration was in favor of a gag rule. That is not the fact. The administration does not intrude into the province of this House and tell it how to conduct its business.

Mr. Speaker, we allotted 20 hours of general debate. I hope the members of the Ways and Means Committee will stay on the floor. I hope the membership as a whole will stay here and give attention to the consideration of this bill. This bill probably should be perfected. There may be mistakes, errors, and fallacies in it, so we appeal to the membership to stay here during its consideration. We hope every opportunity for debate will be granted. We hope that every amendment may be offered, in spite of what has been said here today. Whoever presides in that chair as Chairman must rule in accordance with the precedents of the House, and if I am the only man left alive I am going to stand against the day when you take the Manual of that beloved Democrat, Thomas Jefferson, and tear it into shreds.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CONNERY. On the previous question, would a vote of "no" leave the rule open for amendment?

The SPEAKER. And debate, of course.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Thirty-six Members have risen; not a sufficient number.

The yeas and nays were refused.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MARCANTONIO) there were—ayes 188, noes 54.

So the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MARCANTONIO) there were—ayes 177, noes 50.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Fifty-three Members have risen; a sufficient number.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Clerk called the roll; and there were—yeas 288, nays 103, not voting 40, as follows:

M'GROARTY BILL

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one-half minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, as one in favor of the McGroarty bill, I desire that the RECORD show at this point that I voted against the previous question on the rule to consider the security bill.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES AND EDUCATION

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a radio address which I made.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address which I made Tuesday, April 9:

I wish to thank the National Broadcasting Co. for giving me this opportunity to speak to you. It is a great treat to me to face a microphone again. This metal apparatus and I are well acquainted. I represent the Third Congressional District of Nebraska. My home town is Norfolk, which is located in about the center of that district. Norfolk is the home of the Norfolk Daily News, the world's greatest country daily newspaper—the home of the printer's devil and pioneer radio station WJAG, where I presided at the microphone for many years. So I take this opportunity of greeting my friends who may be listening in at home.

Recently I talked over the radio on what the House has accomplished up to this time in the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress. Even up to now we have done nothing more than pass bills authorizing the appropriations of gigantic sums of money. The total up to today is $7,373,718,389.

We have just given authority to our President to spend about $5,000,000,000 for work relief to end permanently this depression. The record-breaking, peace-time spending program has as its purpose putting at least 3,500,000 unemployed persons back to work. If this program doesn't do it, what will then happen?

Out of our population of about 125,000,000 people 22,000,000 were dependent on public charity for support in February last, when Federal relief rolls reached their peak. One person out of every five must rely on the financial strength and generosity of the administration for the necessities of life. Can our Government continue to support them indefinitely, or is it more important to put those people back to work in some sort of legitimate occupation? The spending program must be so guided, in my opinion, that its aim is to win this war on depression, which must be considered temporary and not permanent and that the people must eventually be educated toward self-support.

The money spending history of our country is interesting. In 124 years, 1789–1913, the total Federal appropriations were around $24,000,000,000. In only 3 years, 1934, 1935, and 1936, the total of Federal appropriations will be the same, about $24,000,000,000. That's significant, is it not? We will be spending $13,000 every minute of the day and night, and out of that it is estimated $7,000 will be added every minute to our public debt to be paid by the future generations. Every person will be paying about $64.50 as compared with about $42.16 in the previous 20 years which included the war. Quite a difference in spending, is it not? The war on this depression is more costly than a real war.

All of this is a lot of money—a gigantic sum of money to be placed in the hands of one man. However, we must not forget that this man is our President, that this is our Government, and that all of this is our money, and this is our country; that this war on the depression is our war and that we must be prepared for the future; that if this gigantic fund does not do what it is intended, you must be prepared to spend more of your money. No other workable solution has been accepted. The future means more taxes in the event this program does not work.

The general conviction of your Representatives in Congress is one of inquiry. There is very little feeling of direct criticism. There is a general feeling that a united effort must be made now to bring permanent recovery and that assistance must also come from the people all over the country. In these difficult days nothing can be more helpful to the country or to the people themselves than for them to have faith in and patience with their Government, and for them to realize that they themselves are the Government of the United States.

From now on, people the country over are going to turn their attention to the study of the new $5,000,000,000 work-relief fund in the hands of our President. In this act is an item reading "$300,000,000 for 'assistance for educational, professional, and clerical persons.'" Like the rest of the big fund, this item will be spent at the discretion of the President. For that reason some members of the House committee on education, of which I am a member, are praying that this money be used mainly toward keeping open our elementary schools and have asked that I talk briefly on that topic today. The place where children learn reading, writing, and arithmetic is important. Not so much for higher education, because we already have millions of young men and women out of the colleges and universities walking the streets of our Nation looking for jobs, but to save the schools which give the necessary education for children. In my own State of Nebraska, my State superintendent of education informs me that many schools are threatened with closing down. In one county—Thurston County—80 percent of the school taxes have not been paid because the taxpayers are broke and cannot pay. Do you know that three and a half million children in 26 States will be turned away from school unless these States get Federal aid? Billions of dollars are asked for roads, soil erosion, grade-crossing elimination, reforestation, for the creation of jobs, for the white-collar worker, and for a number of other designated meritorious purposes. Surely we ought to keep the school bells ringing.

Many bills are before the Committee on Education for school assistance. All of them are held up pending information as to what is to be done with the $300,000,000 for education. In the meantime thousands of schools are closed and thousands more are closing, because the taxpayers have no money to pay the school teachers. It is not for higher education that we are pleading but for the fundamentals of the proverbial "little red schoolhouse", which institution we believe is essential if our Government is to endure, because that is where we learned our first lessons of patriotism—at the feet of the teacher. All the glowing spots of American history are learned in the grade school. Through that school America has become Americanized. The school is fundamental to our Government, and we cannot and must not let the doors of our grade schools be closed as they are being closed now.

Our biggest plea to the American public in this connection is that the unemployed teacher must have just as much recognition as a useful worker as any other person to be considered in the gigantic work-relief bill. Money will be spent and the prayer goes out to you that this money be spent wisely, economically, and by efficient persons, trained in the various lines of work where this money is to be used. We pray that the money to be spent to keep the school doors open be spent by experienced school people who are trained in school life with the interests of education at heart. Therefore we pray that in allocating this money for educational purposes the President allocate it through the offices of the Commissioner of Education and not through any political relief set-up. Many representations from reliable school people have come to us showing that there was considerable waste through relief set-ups in allocating relief money for schools during the past year and fearing a repetition of this waste of your money, they are pleading that the school authorities be given the allocation of Federal funds for school purposes. Let us keep the grade schools clean of politics and above all let us keep the doors of our little red schoolhouses open for the children of our beloved country

Just a last word: This hour is one demanding serious meditation on the part of all American citizens. We have heard statements made on the floor of the House of Representatives that this gigantic relief fund is in danger of being used as a political campaign fund next year. God forbid that we should even think that this could be true. Let us serve notice now on the scheming politicians that we, the people to whom this Government belongs—to whom this money belongs, that we want this great relief fund so distributed that it will accomplish its original purpose—bring permanent relief—to put unhappy, unemployed people back to work. Not one penny of this gigantic sum must remain in the palms of selfish, unpatriotic, political spoilsmen.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MAAS. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. FULLER. What does the gentleman wish to speak about?

Mr. MAAS. There was a resolution reported back to the House today by the Post Office Committee, and I want to explain an agreement which I have with the chairman of that committee.

Mr. FULLER. I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Speaker, I introduced a resolution of inquiry directing the Post Office Department to furnish to the House certain information as to the reorganization of the air mail lines. The Post Office Department has furnished this information voluntarily, and in agreement with the chairman of that committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD], I ask that the information which was voluntarily furnished be referred to the Post Office Committee. In a further agreement with the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD], that he appoint a subcommittee to examine the material, he will permit me to be heard on that material. In view of these agreements, I have no objection to laying the resolution on the table. Its purpose has been fulfilled.

THE HOLDING COMPANIES

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include a radio speech which I made.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me on April 11, 1935:

Fellow Americans, I am going to talk to you tonight about the Wheeler-Rayburn bill, particularly the first part of the bill, which concerns utility-holding companies. The measure deals with the power industry and the gas industry, and contains far-reaching provisions designed to protect the investor and the consumer.

Concerning the holding-company or Wheeler-Rayburn bill, I received a letter from a widow down in my State, who has a ranch near the Rio Grande, and where I visited when I was a boy. She sent me a lot of pamphlets that had been sent her by the power companies, urging her to write her Congressman, and in her letter she urged me to vote against the holding-company bill because it is "unfair, unwise, and seriously harmful to the stockholders." In my reply, I analyzed her stock, which at the time of purchase was $65 per share and is now $2. Now, this is 97-percent loss in money. All that happened, you understand, without any Government regulation. So I wrote her and said: "If you had 65 horses in the north pasture and somebody went south with 63 horses, leaving you 2 horses, this would be a 97-percent loss in horses; so would you object if the sheriff came in and patched up your fence and locked the gate and regulated the movement of persons around your ranch to save the 2 horses that were left?" She got the point all right, but I was fair and also gave her a good many details, some of which I shall give tonight. I am pleased to say that this old friend of mine (like hundreds of others back in Texas) has changed her mind entirely and is now strong for the holding-company bill.

You see, the control of the great gas and electric industry in this country is steadily and surely passing into fewer and fewer hands—and that means less and less into yours. The means by which this dangerous concentration of control is being brought about is the "holding" company. About 85 percent of the entire private power industry is today under holding-company domination. In 1932 thirteen companies controlled 75 percent of the power industry, about one-half of which was in the hands of three large companies, which were not even independent among themselves.

Let us bear in mind that the typical holding company has no physical assets whatever of its own. It does not own the utility properties in your and my community; these properties belong to the operating companies. The holding company merely holds securities in these operating companies. By this financial arrangement and other devices, a few insiders in the financial centers of the country, and with relatively small investments, completely dominate most of the local operating companies in this country. They make themselves a serious detriment to local business in every part of the Nation.

The local managers are told what to do and what not to do. They are told what to buy, and from whom, and what to pay. Their political activities and every turn of their official lives are dominated by these absentee masters. In addition to that, the local companies are compelled to accept all sorts of services, frequently not needed, but which the holding companies force upon them, and under contracts that exact exorbitant fees and commissions. The Rayburn bill will put business back in your home town where it belongs. Instead of permitting unregulated gambling with your money, thereby creating large fortunes elsewhere, it will build up local industry. By so doing it will stabilize the industry and give you and me and our children a chance for better living.

Release your local operating companies from holding company control! Your operating companies have many loyal employees and they can become more independent and will be better off. Furthermore, they can devote their interests directly to the development of your community, instead of bowing to the dictates of some smart paper-stock manipulator, who lives a long way off and has no interest in your home territory.

Now to sum up this situation as concerns your own home community: First, it will free the local operating company from the excessive burdens that these fantastic superstructures have imposed. Second, it will help to break up the centralization, combination, and control of wealth.

We recall from our histories how a few landed overlords in the days of feudalism in Europe controlled the masses of the people as serfs and vassals. We forget, perhaps, that we have developed in this country a new kind of feudalistic technique by which the overlords of finance sit at the top of a vast industrial pyramid controlling the welfare and destinies of multitudes; we must not allow it. Talk about widows and orphans! What chance have they got, or our children to get along, to get jobs, with private empires taking away the rights of local profits, interest, and a chance to succeed?

Don't you realize that your city is probably haphazardly tied in with numerous other cities anywhere and everywhere else, with holding companies using scattered investors, using such things as interlocking directorates, with a modern ingenuity the feudal landlords never dreamed of? And further, concentrated in a way that cannot possibly benefit your community?

According to the investigations of the Federal Trade Commission during the past few years, these companies by inflation—and paper and wind build-up—of their capital account, have exacted colossal profits from both consumer and investor. These speculators have traded upon the credulity of the investing public by marketing securities at exorbitant prices that in reality represented little more than fictitious values. When holding companies issued bonds and preferred stock of their own, and continued this trick process through a long series of intermediate companies they well knew, as you did not, that such securities represented little more than what amounts to third, fourth, or fifth mortgages against the assets of the operating companies.

This had a direct bearing upon the fact that common stock of holding companies today stand at about 5 percent, and sometimes less, of the 1929 level, and are relatively lower than any other group of investments. And my friends, the Rayburn bill had absolutely nothing to do with this collapse. As early as 1932—that's 3 years ago—these stocks had fallen to about one-eighth and less of their previous level, which was long before the introduction of the Rayburn bill or any intimation of Government regulation. What the Rayburn bill does is to protect what is left and prevent, as far as possible, future collapses and heavy losses of your money.

The Insull smash-up is still fresh in our memories. It is estimated that some 100,000 security holders lost over a billion dollars in this collapse. Just imagine it. I am not jumping on Mr. Insull; he is done for, and his stockholders were done for before him; it is only an example. But other utility-holding companies have something left, so let's save the rest of it.

And yet, the Power Trust is trying to tell you that these original write-ups, that dropped like shooting stars, did not hurt anyone. They try to tell you that electric rates are based on "fair value" or "going value" or "reproduction cost" and not on the value written up on the companies' books. But you and I know that those paper valuations are used to bolster up and justify extortionate rates. The Power Trust also tries to tell you that the investor was not hurt by these write-ups. But you and I know that the investor believed that the values he found on the companies' books were real values and not juggled figures. The investor, when he bought holding-company securities, believed that the values shown on the books represented the money that had gone to build the electric and gas properties. The investor did not know that a large part of the holding company's money had gone to buy various utility stocks at fantastic prices from corporate insiders and others. The ordinary investor did not understand this. Neither did the ordinary consumer understand this. But the ordinary investor and the ordinary consumer have paid for it, and paid heavily. If we don't protect ourselves in the future, it will be our own fault.

Now, don't you think it obvious that when these companies are overcapitalized by inflation, when extortionate service fees are charged, that you have to pay for it in high and excessive rates. Ultimately, all profits must come from the consumer at the bottom. They may exploit the investor temporarily, of course. For this reason, the investor and the consumer alike have a mutual interest in securing protection. Therefore, it is for the benefit of all that this bill is written.

Now, let's get down to what this bill really seeks to accomplish. It merely seeks, in a practical way and within a reasonable length of time, to eliminate those companies that are parasitic, that feed on the operating companies and perform no useful purpose. It seeks to eliminate the evils of absentee management and to restore local responsibility. It puts an end to "inside" profits and whatever value is behind a security now will, of course, remain there under the new law. Keep that in mind. The holding companies in their propaganda campaign have drawn pathetic pictures of old men and women, of widows and orphans, who will lose the pennies which they have saved and invested in holding-company securities. These promoters appear to have overlooked that point when they were selling these securities at fabulous prices a few years back. How well the investors fared under holding-company protection, with their securities standing at a mere fraction of their original purchase price. One day these companies are telling us how disastrous the bill will be to their securities; the next day they are telling us how the values of these securities have already been practically destroyed. To get down to the real rough facts, holding companies are organized on paper for profits—not for you or for me, but for the corporate insiders. Let me tell you that the holding companies never helped widows and orphans before, and won't in the future.

I must repeat again—your Government did not cause your losses. This bill does, however, hope to prevent the reoccurrence of such disasters in the future. One of the more far-reaching provisions of the bill and, in my opinion, one of the most important, is the jurisdiction which it gives to existing Federal agencies to control interstate transmission of electric energy and natural gas. This act in title 2 seeks to coordinate on a regional scale the Nation's power resources. Under its provisions the power companies can voluntarily associate themselves together, under Government supervision, into a system for generation and transmission of power. This will make for an adequate supply of electricity for all parts of the country at the lowest possible costs. It will encourage the extension of electric service to unserved areas, especially the rural areas. About 88 percent of our farmers are now without electric service.

The Federal Power Commission can make investigations, require and prescribe reports, evaluate properties, and control security issues to those companies engaged in interstate transmission of power. This will prove an invaluable and necessary aid to your own State commissions. The State commissions will in no way have their jurisdiction impaired, but will retain complete control in the field of distribution and over all operations within the State. The Federal work will be only supplementary.

Its trained men will be available to assist in hearings and furnish information which the State commissions need to make regulation effective. It will thus add to the power, prestige, and effectiveness of the State commissions. You can see for yourself that power interests are concentrating their subversive propaganda efforts against this provision of the bill, because they want the power for themselves.

State commissions, let me say, are today powerless to regulate many phases of the utility business. Holding companies are incorporated in other States, which makes their security transactions and their unfair contractual arrangements with their subsidiaries beyond the reach of your State commission.

The power industry transcends State lines. Regulations must be coextensive with operations, so we need the Rayburn bill. Attempts to regulate holding companies by State laws have been practically impossible. As the National Power Policy Committee stated in its recent report, "Attempts by State commissions to protect the consumer from the burdens which holding-company practices have imposed upon him have been, and practically always must be, largely unsuccessful. The public-utility holding companies are located in every State. Electric Bond & Share Co. has operating companies in 36 States, and 8 other systems have units in 11 to 29 States. Many holding companies have affiliations, sometimes amounting to control, with banking interests, construction companies, coal mines, newspapers, and other interests. Their securities are widely marketed by use of the mails and the instrumentalities of interstate commerce to investors throughout the country. Holding-company operations are too extensive, State commission powers and funds too limited, to make thorough and effective State action possible. And usually the holding companies have purposely arranged their organization and operations to keep out of reach of State regulation; their lawyers have challenged the jurisdiction of such regulation."

I am thinking of a situation in my own State where we are now battling for State regulation. I am thinking of those people in several towns and cities who have been paying annual profits of from 40 to 50 percent upon the real investment of a holding company. If we had the advantage of the Tennessee Valley Authority scale of rates in Texas today, we would be saving about $24,000,000 annually, or an amount about equal to our annual State budget. Believe me, down in Texas this saving would certainly help.

We must act now and act decisively if we are to save our people from the dictatorship of these wolf-pack combinations.

It is always hard to break the control of an inside set-up. Naturally, the President's efforts, and the efforts of Congress, are being opposed by one of the greatest directed, synthetic, propaganda campaigns in our history. Timid people are just being scared by false information. Let me tell you this is one time the Government is attempting to do something that will really benefit the people and protect the investor.

Fellow Americans, listen carefully just one more minute: First of all, the Government is not something mystical up in the air, or sitting in Washington. You and I must be the Government, and as citizens we must seek to eliminate an unregulated, ruthless, brutal empire superimposed over our local businesses and local governments. These private empires simply do not fit in with ordinary economy and good government and must be eliminated.

Let us, as citizens, have a common feeling for the welfare of all the people. The Rayburn bill is perfectly fair and it will perpetuate the benefits of private incentive and community welfare, which the holding companies now make almost impossible, and will help to safeguard the economic security of our people, the consumers as well as the investors.

Fellow Americans, this is the most important and the squarest bill before Congress. Don't let the Power Trust frighten you.

AN ANALYSIS OF THE VOTE IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE QUESTION OF PAYING THE ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES AND AMERICAN LEGION SECRET EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE MEETING

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a radio address.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, the Ways and Means Committee is composed of 25 members. January 14, 1935, 19 of these members favored the Patman bill, and 6 were opposed to any bill. On that day the Vinson bill was introduced in the House, which took away eight of the Patman bill supporters. The bill was never introduced in the Senate, where its strength was claimed to be the greatest. The committee then stood 11 for the Patman bill, 8 for the Vinson bill, and 6 against any bill. The Vinson supporters and those opposed to any bill cooperated and received a favorable report on the Vinson bill from the committee 14 to 11. In other words, the opponents of any legislation dictated the favorable report on the Vinson bill by reason of the wedge being driven through the forces of the proponents.

The supporters of the Vinson bill in the committee were: 8 Democrats and 6 Republicans (including 6 against any bill); against, 10 Democrats and 1 Republican.

The supporters of the Vinson bill in the House: 120, who favored a full-payment bill, and 84 who were opposed to a full-payment bill, making a total of 204.

Among this number were 83 percent of the 102 Republicans, 93⅓ percent of all Members of the House opposed to any bill, and 98 percent of the supporters of the Tydings bill that will give the holder of a $1,000 certificate, who has borrowed every chance, the sum of $154 in full payment.

VINSON BILL SUPPORTED BY ORGANIZED MINORITIES

In the House there are 435 Members. The Vinson bill never did, at any time, receive more than 120 votes from Members that favored any bill providing for the payment of these certificates. The Vinson bill did receive almost solid support from the Republican Members of the House, as it did in the committee. It received almost the solid support of those who were opposed to any bill. It received almost the solid support of those who wanted to give the veterans a small settlement in full payment. In other words, the Patman bill was opposed by those who opposed any legislation, by those who opposed any other form of payment, and the Republican minority. Organized minorities, cooperating, drove a wedge through our forces.

REPUBLICANS IN HOUSE SUPPORTING PATMAN BILL

Every Republican in the House, except the following, voted for the Vinson motion to recommit, March 22, 1935:

Burdick, North Dakota; Carlson, Kansas; Dirksen, Illinois; Marcantonio, New York; Dondero, Michigan; Gilchrist, Iowa; Guyer, Kansas; Hope, Kansas; Knutson, Minnesota; Lambertson, Kansas; Wolverton, New Jersey; Lemke, North Dakota; Marcantonio, New York; Pittenger, Minnesota; Seger, New Jersey; Stefan, Nebraska; and Thurston, Iowa.

HOW ORGANIZED MINORITIES CAN CONTROL

In the Committee on Ways and Means, the Patman bill received 61 percent of the support of the members of that committee, who favored any bill. Yet the bill receiving 39 percent of such support, the Vinson bill, got a favorable report. The Patman bill received 63⅓ percent of all the votes in the House of the Members who favored any bill. It prevailed over the Vinson bill by only three votes by reason of the combination herein mentioned. Of the 204 voting for the Vinson bill in preference to the Patman bill, 84 of them were against any bill and voted against the bill on final passage. The 207 Patman bill supporters have been in the past and are now enthusiastic advocates of the payment and believe it is the best plan to get results. Not one of the supporters of H. R. 1—the Patman bill—voted for the Tydings substitute, which would give the holder of a $1,000 certificate, who has borrowed every chance, the sum of $154 in full payment.

PATMAN BILL STOOD 5 TESTS IN 2 DAYS

The Patman bill is the only bill that was ever required to stand 5 tests in the House of Representatives in 2 days. The Vinson supporters were allowed two of these tests.

The steering committee for the passage of H. R. 1, which was opposed by a majority of the Ways and Means Committee, the proponents of all other plans, the opponents of any legislation on the subject, and the Republican minority, yet were victorious in a fair fight before the House of Representatives, were as follows:

Wright Patman, chairman; Abe Murdock, secretary; Adolph J. Sabath, Illinois; James G. Scrugham, Nevada; Arthur H. Greenwood, Indiana; William M. Colmer, Mississippi; Jennings Randolph, West Virginia; Clarence Cannon, Missouri; Wm. P. Connery, Jr., Massachusetts; William M. Berlin, Pennsylvania; Frank Hancock, North Carolina; Jed Johnson, Oklahoma; James P. Richards, South Carolina; Gerald J. Boileau, Wisconsin; Andrew J. May, Kentucky; Fred H. Hildebrandt, South Dakota; Martin F. Smith, Washington; Martin Dies, Texas; John E. Miller, Arkansas; George A. Dondero, Michigan; Paul J. Kvale, Minnesota; Roy E. Ayers, Montana.

I am personally greatly indebted to the members of this steering committee for their very able, loyal, and effective support of this cause.

There are many other Members of this House who are also entitled to receive the greatest recognition possible for their contribution to this successful battle.

The steering committee and the author of H. R. 1 sent a letter of thanks to the 318 Members supporting the bill on final roll call, although many of them favored other plans. We appreciated their support of the legislation.

VOTES BY STATES

The figures indicated in the parentheses preceding the name of the State indicate the number of Members of the House of Representatives from that State. The figure in parentheses after the name of the State indicate the number of Members of the House from that State who voted against final passage of the bill to pay the adjusted-service certificates. There were 90 in all who voted this way:

(9) Alabama (3), (1) Arizona (0), (7) Arkansas (1), (20) California (3), (4) Colorado (1), (5) Connecticut (5), (1) Delaware (0), (4) Florida (2), (10) Georgia (2), (2) Idaho (0), (25) Illinois (3), (12) Indiana (2), (9) Iowa (2), (7) Kansas (0), (9) Kentucky (1), (8) Louisiana (0), (3) Maine (0), (6) Maryland (1), (15) Massachusetts (7), (17) Michigan (1), (9) Minnesota (1), (7) Mississippi (1), (13) Missouri (2), (2) Montana (0), (5) Nebraska (1), (1) Nevada (0), (2) New Hampshire (1), (14) New Jersey (6), (1) New Mexico (1), (43) New York (17), (11) North Carolina (2), (2) North Dakota (0), (22) Ohio (7), (8) Oklahoma (0), (3) Oregon (0), (34) Pennsylvania (2), (2) Rhode Island (1), (6) South Carolina (1), (2) South Dakota (0), (9) Tennessee (2), (21) Texas (2), (2) Utah (0), (1) Vermont (1), (9) Virginia (7), (6) Washington (0), (6) West Virginia (0), (10) Wisconsin (1), and (1) Wyoming (1).

BELGRANO, TAYLOR, AND PATMAN

Mr. Frank N. Belgrano, Jr., national commander of the American Legion, who was the author of, and caused to be introduced, H. R. 3896—the Vinson bill—resides in San Francisco, Calif. There are 13 Democrats and 7 Republicans from California in the House of Representatives. Eleven of the 13 Democrats voted favorably to the Patman bill, 1 present, and 1 for the Vinson bill. Of the 7 Republicans, 6 voted for the Vinson bill and 1 not voting. The solid Republican bloc in California voted for the Vinson bill and the practically solid Democratic bloc voted for the Patman bill. Of the 18 Members voting, 11 voted for the Patman bill and 7 for the Vinson bill.

Mr. John Thomas Taylor, the legislative representative for the American Legion, who claimed that the Vinson bill was so strong in the Senate where he never asked anyone to introduce it, resides in the Sixth District of Pennsylvania. His own Congressman voted against the payment of the adjusted-service certificates. From the State of Pennsylvania there are 34 Members of the House of Representatives, 23 Democrats and 11 Republicans. Of the 23 Democrats, 17 voted for H. R. 1—the Patman bill—1 present, 1 not voting, 1 voted for the Patman bill one day and the Vinson bill the next day, and 3 voted for the Vinson bill. Of the 11 Republicans, 8 voted for the Vinson bill, 2 voted for H. R. 1—the Patman bill—and 1 voted both ways, resulting in the Patman bill receiving 19 votes, the Vinson bill 11 votes, 1 present, 1 not voting, and 2 voting both ways.

Texas has 21 Members in the House of Representatives. Only 2 Texas Members voted against full payment and only 1 Texas Member voted against the Patman bill in favor of the Vinson bill.

SECRET MEETING OF AMERICAN LEGION EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE

National Commander Frank N. Belgrano, Jr., called a meeting of the executive committee to determine what should be done after the House passed the Patman bill instead of the Vinson bill, although he had said many times that he would support the bill passed by the House. This committee, composed of about 57 members, met at Indianapolis, Ind., April 2, 1935. It was a secret meeting and executive session. I was not invited to attend, neither was any member of our steering committee or any other person who was in a position to give all of the facts regarding this controversy. The meeting was addressed by the commander, Mr. Belgrano, and by the legislative representative, Mr. Taylor, after which a resolution was passed, endorsing the actions taken by Commander Belgrano and Mr. Taylor in doing what the committee construed to be carrying out the mandates of the Miami convention. The resolution was as follows:

RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY THE NATIONAL EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE, THE AMERICAN LEGION, APRIL 2, 1935

The national executive committee of the American Legion states:

That the national executive committee of the American Legion in special session duly assembled at national headquarters in the city of Indianapolis, Ind., on this the 2d day of April 1935, does hereby express its full approval of the effort extended and action taken by National Commander Frank N. Belgrano, Jr., and the national legislative committee in support of and in endeavoring to carry out the mandates of the Miami convention and particularly that relating to the payment of the adjusted-service compensation certificates.

1. That all World War veterans have a right to expect that their adjusted-service certificates will be paid in full at this time at face value and with cancelation of interest accrued and refund of interest paid.

2. This organization is not concerned with the merits or demerits of inflation or in any other controversial question that is not within the scope of the activities of the American Legion.

3. Believing that the only bill which is reasonably assured of final passage is one which includes no other question than the immediate payment of the adjusted-service certificates, the national commander and the national legislative committee are directed to diligently pursue such a course as should ultimately effect the passage of this type of bill at this session of Congress.

A few American Legion leaders persuaded the Chicago convention to concern itself about inflation. In a way that would help the big special-privileged bankers. Therefore, the American Legion has concerned itself with this question, and it evidently does come within the scope of American Legion activities.

COMMITTEE ACTED CONSCIENTIOUSLY

The members of this committee were not in a position to know both sides of this controversy. I am sure they conscientiously did what they felt was right under the circumstances based upon the limited knowledge and information available to them. It was a "star chamber" proceedings. Messrs. Belgrano and Taylor have never permitted my side of this question to reach the legionnaires, if it were possible for them to prevent it. They control the American Legion publications, which are filled with unfair and misleading statements about this great and vital issue. There is no effective way that I can get the facts to the members of the American Legion. The mailing list has been refused me. They have every advantage, aided by secret meetings where words are spoken that I will never know about and where probably charges and allegations were made against me that neither I nor anyone in possession of the facts was permitted to refute with the true and correct information.

TOES OF BIG BANKERS STEPPED ON

At this meeting, evidently the charge was made that our bill was an inflationary bill, as something was said in the resolution about inflation. This is not true. Our bill will not necessarily cause an additional dollar to be placed in circulation. The puppets and hirelings of Wall Street call it an inflationary bill, because they are trying to mislead the people. Our bill does step on the big bankers' toes, I will admit that. It will cause $2,000,000,000 to be placed in circulation, upon which no one will be paying interest and probably cause the withdrawal of $2,000,000,000 of big bankers' money that has been issued to the bankers free of charge and upon which someone is paying interest every day it is outstanding. We are for this payment if it does step on the big bankers' toes, and we do not feel that we should be compelled to pay the big bankers a bonus in order to pay the veterans a debt.

BELGRANO AND TAYLOR

Messrs. Belgrano and Taylor have been fighting this proposal for 6 long years; they never favored it until they were drafted into the fight; they had to either advocate the full payment of these certificates or give up their jobs. I personally doubt that anyone in that position can as wholeheartedly and enthusiastically support the proposal as those of us who have been carrying on the fight for 6 years. Further, Colonel Taylor asked Congress in 1924 to give the veterans the I O U's and post-dated checks they have today. He asked Congress to give them these certificates with the terms and provisions that they now contain. He asked Congress to refuse to give them a cash settlement and opposed a cash settlement in 1924. Unfortunately, the members of the American Legion—a greater body of men never lived on earth and a greater organization never existed—have as their representatives in this fight two men who have always opposed us in our efforts to get this just and honest debt paid.

UNITED FRONT

If the American Legion members will send us representatives to Washington that will work shoulder to shoulder with us in this fight we will get 100-percent cash payment this session. If Belgrano and Taylor are allowed to carry out their wishes we will not be successful, and will lose the great start toward complete victory won in the House of Representatives.

SOCIAL-SECURITY BILL

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7260) to provide for the general welfare by establishing a system of Federal old-age benefits, and by enabling the several States to make more adequate provision for aged persons, dependent and crippled children, maternal and child welfare, public health, and the administration of their unemployment compensation laws; to establish a social-security board; to raise revenue; and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7260, with Mr. McREYNOLDS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may desire to use.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, as this is one of the most important measures coming before the Congress for consideration at this session and, perhaps, as important as any measure that the Congress in recent years has been called upon to consider, I prefer not to be interrupted until I have finished my statement. However, I shall not decline to yield. It is my purpose, so far as I may be able to do so, to explain the purposes and the provisions of this bill and I desire to do so in as consecutive a manner as I am capable of doing.

The social-security bill (H. R. 7260), which has been favorably reported by the Ways and Means Committee, is based upon the recommendations of the President in his message to both Houses of Congress on January 17 of this year, and the detailed report and recommendations of his Committee on Economic Security, which was transmitted at that time.

Nearly a year ago, on June 8, the President transmitted a message to Congress advocating social-security legislation, and shortly thereafter he created, by Executive order, a committee consisting of the Secretary of Labor as chairman, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Attorney General, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Federal Emergency Relief Administrator, instructing his committee to make a comprehensive study of the many factors in our industrial life which lead to dependency and destitution, and to recommend appropriate measures which would provide protection against these causes of insecurity.

The Ways and Means Committee, to whom these recommendations for legislation were referred, held hearings on the subject for 3 weeks, at which time all persons desiring to be heard were given an opportunity to express their opinions. The record of the public hearings fills a volume of over 1,100 pages. Practically every person appearing before the committee was in favor of the broad purposes of the economic-security program, and their criticisms were directed to particular features of it rather than to its fundamental purposes. These criticisms have been taken into account in the thorough revision made by the committee. Following the hearings, the Ways and Means Committee worked over this legislation in executive session for more than a month, and carefully considered every part and phase of the broad problem of social security. The proposed bill has been entirely rewritten, and important modifications have been made at many points. The fundamental recommendations of the President and his Committee on Economic Security, however, are embodied in the new bill reported to you by the Ways and Means Committee.

I do not believe since I have been a Member of this body any bill that has been considered by the Congress has been given more thorough, more careful, or more painstaking consideration, or where broader latitude has been afforded to everyone desiring to be heard and express his view than has been the case in the consideration of this legislation.

The proposed bill has been entirely rewritten and many important modifications made, as I believe will be testified to by each member of the committee.

The proposed bill presents a broad plan for social security, embracing measures for (1) protection against destitution and dependency in old age, (2) unemployment compensation, (3) security for children, and (4) increased public health protection. These measures of protection against the principle causes of destitution and dependency, taken together, in conjunction with the immediate program of public works, and with the cooperation of the States, will provide a coordinated plan for social security. It is of great importance that the many overlapping phases of insecurity should be approached in this manner, rather than through separate piecemeal proposals.

The social-security bill is one of the most important measures ever placed before Congress for its consideration. While it is designed to enhance very greatly the security of the American worker and to provide a larger measure of social justice, it does so within the scope of our existing economic order. In no way does it resemble the many panaceas and nostrums which propose that we legislate ourselves into prosperity by lifting ourselves by our bootstraps, and which would upset our established economic and political institutions. The fact that several of these proposals have attracted a wide-spread following implies a threat to our existing institutions which should not be regarded lightly.

We do not claim the bill under consideration to be a perfect measure, nor one that will not require amendment from time to time, in the light of experience, but, in view of the present very great lack of economic security of the American worker, it represents a long step forward and a step which we cannot wisely postpone.

The social-security program of the administration is an attempt to mitigate and to prevent the distress and suffering which so frequently arise from our industrial economy. So long as the country was largely agricultural, and industry was conducted on a small scale, there was relatively little need for such measures of protection as the social-security bill will provide. The insecurity of the worker arising from unemployment and dependency in old age was much less than at present. The industrialization of society, the development of large corporations, the increasing use of machinery, the great number of unemployed, as well as the increasing number of persons dependent in old age, make it necessary that we take measures which will restore to the American worker and his family the degree of social security which he formerly enjoyed.

Today we see frightful evidence of insecurity on every hand. The fact that more than 15,000,000 persons are receiving unemployment relief is perhaps our most striking evidence of insecurity. Nearly a million of these persons are over 65 years of age. A much larger number are over 50 years of age, and have little prospect of ever again becoming employed. Nine million of the persons on relief are children under 16 years of age, many of whom have never known what it is to have a regular wage earner in the family. It is estimated that at present 10,000,000 wage earners are unemployed, although only about half of these are receiving unemployment relief.

As long as this large number are unemployed and dependent on public charity for their sustenance, the great mass of American families, those in which there are employed wage earners, can feel no real security.

The existence of such a large relief problem, the presence of insecurity on such a vast scale, is a serious threat to our economic order. We must certainly deplore the extent to which large masses of our people are weighed down by privation and suffering, and we cannot overlook the grave social danger implied in the deterioration and pauperization of a large section of our population. We cannot afford to delay further the legislation which is necessary to protect our American workers against the many hazards of our industrial order which lead to huge relief rolls and threaten the foundations of our society.

The social-security program of the administration grew out of a determination to find a better way of dealing with the causes which have brought about the present acute situation. It should not be regarded as a substitue for relief, for there will always be the necessity for some public charity. It will not benefit immediately all of those now on relief, but other protection is provided for them. What the bill will do is this: Relieve much of the present distress and greatly lessen the incidence of destitution and dependency in future years.

The essential feature of the social-security bill is that of social insurance against the principal hazards or risks which have caused American families to become dependent upon relief. These causes are well known: (1) Unemployment, (2) old age, (3) lack of a breadwinner in families with young children, and (4) sickness. The bill includes comprehensive measures against all but the last of these. Measures proposed to furnish protection against the risks arising out of old age and unemployment are usually called social insurance. Social insurance protects the worker and his family against dependency by enabling them, with the help of their employers, to build up reserves which may be used during periods of unemployment and in old age. Protection for the family with young children under 16 lacking a wage earner, is provided through Government funds rather than through social insurance.

The principle of insurance is familiar to all of us. No country in the world is more insurance-minded than we are, as evidenced by the statistics upon the amount of insurance in effect in this country. Certainly everyone will recognize that the greatest economic risk facing the average American family today is that of unemployment. There should be no argument as to the social desirability for applying the principle of insurance against this risk. Let no one say that insurance against these serious social dangers is contrary to our institutions, or that it will undermine the integrity of the American citizen.

The advantages of social insurance over public relief are many. It does not carry with it the stigma of charity with its devastating effect on the morale of our population and its loss of self-respect. The protection afforded by social insurance comes to the worker as a matter of right. It is contingent upon the previous employment and contributions of the worker himself and does not involve the social investigation and the means test which is inevitable in any system of public relief. Contrary to the mistaken impression of many persons, social insurance does not place a premium upon idleness. Quite the contrary. The worker's right to benefits is conditioned upon his previous employment, and social insurance will do nothing to break down the sacred American tradition of self-reliance and initiative.

Social insurance quite justifiably places on industry itself a part of the burden of unemployment. Under suitable legislation, industry can and will be encouraged to go far toward stabilization and regularization of employment. Social insurance will be beneficial to society as well as to the worker himself. It upholds the purchasing power of the great mass of wage earners upon which the welfare of our industrial order is so greatly dependent. It counteracts deflationary tendencies particularly at the outset of a depression and does much to allay its most disastrous effects. In providing individuals with a real sense of security, it has a social effect of the utmost significance.

Social insurance is now in operation in most of the industrial countries of the world. Some of these countries have had social insurance for as long as 50 years; and the device has an even older history, going back for a hundred years or more in the private systems of European labor organizations. In this country labor organizations and individual employers have operated social-insurance systems on a limited scale for a number of years, but we are one of the latest of the industrial countries to consider social insurance on a broad governmental basis. Practically every other progressive country in the world has not merely one form of social insurance, but a fairly complete system, covering several types of risks not covered in the proposed legislation.

We may very profitably avail ourselves of European experience and avoid many of the mistakes which have been made there. The proposed social-security bill, while based upon careful study of the social-insurance systems of other countries, is not a copy of foreign institutions except in broad outlines. It is designed to fit our own conditions, and economic and political institutions. Our neighboring country to the north—Canada—is now considering very similar legislation proposed by the prime minister. Canada has had Dominion old-age-pension legislation for a number of years.

One of the major features of the social-security bill is protection against dependency and want in old age. This is covered by two titles of the bill. Title I provides for Federal aid to the States for old-age assistance, commonly called "old-age pensions." Title II provides for old-age benefits out of the Federal Treasury, based upon the employment of the wage earner during his lifetime of productive years of work. These represent two separate but complementary provisions for old-age security: The first making provision for persons who are already old and dependent and have passed their span of productive years; the second, for a form of old-age security whereby the employed person who is not yet old may in the future receive benefits which will support him in old age.

Title I, providing for Federal aid to the States for old-age pensions, authorizes an appropriation of $49,750,000 for the next fiscal year, and as much thereafter as may be required. It is assumed that there will be a considerable lag before the State systems are fully operative, and the appropriation required for the first fiscal year is accordingly much smaller than will be required after a year or so when the States have their systems in full swing.

A number of factors combine to make old-age dependency one of our greatest social problems. The number of aged persons in our population has been increasing for several decades. In 1930 there were 6,500,000 persons in this country over 65 years of age. Within the next 35 years it is estimated that this number will more than double, reaching a total of 15 million persons. Not only is the number of aged persons rapidly increasing, but the percentage of persons over 65 years of age to the total population is also rapidly mounting. In 1860 only 2.7 percent of our population was over 65 years of age; by 1930 it had increased to 5.4, and it is estimated that by 1970 it will be over 10 percent. The old-age problem is not a numerical problem alone. The amount of dependency among aged persons is also rapidly increasing. The plight of the aged wage earner who has lost his job is only too well known. Industry demands younger workers, with the result that wage earners find it increasingly difficult to secure employment after the age of 40 or 50.

At the present time it is estimated that approximately half of the 6,500,000 persons over 65 years of age in this country are dependent upon others—approximately one million receiving public relief. The others are being cared for by relatives and friends or are without sufficient means but too proud to accept public assistance except as a last resort. It is extremely doubtful whether more than a few of this number will ever again be self-supporting. The number of persons now over 50 years of age receiving public relief is much larger. Of this group, many if not most will never be able to find suitable employment again. Those who do will be employed at a very great reduction in the wages formerly enjoyed. Even with the return of prosperity, we may be quite sure that the old-age problem will become more and more acute as time goes on. Millions of workers now middle-aged or approaching old age have seen their lifetime earnings swept away during the depression and now face old age with a degree of insecurity never known heretofore.

The problem calls for immediate action to relieve the suffering and distress of those who are already old and who have been the victims of our economic disorders, but it calls further for a wise long-time plan of action which will be practicable, which will be within our economic ability, and which will provide in the future a maximum of security to the individual against old-age dependency.

There is a wide-spread demand throughout the country for a better and more humane and self-respecting method of caring for our dependent aged persons. The serious shortcomings of the care provided old persons in our poorhouses and the unhappy stigma attached to these institutions has rendered them unacceptable to public-minded persons for years. Twenty-nine States and the Territories of Alaska and Hawaii have provided for State old-age assistance, commonly called "old-age pensions", based on the policy that needy old persons should be maintained in their own homes rather than subjected to institutional treatment. It must be recognized that the aged person in need of public assistance is in a different class from the ordinary relief case. There is no question of returning him to society as a wage earner. His time of gainful employment has passed. There is a wide-spread sentiment that the assistance granted him should not carry the stigma of pauper's relief. There is a growing feeling also that society can afford to take care of its needy aged upon a more adequate and more respectable basis than heretofore and should retire these persons from competition with younger workers seeking employment.

Since the first State old-age-pension law was enacted in 1923, the movement has spread rapidly. Although, as has been said, 29 States and 2 Territories have such laws, many of them are inoperative for lack of funds or are limited to a few of the wealthier counties of the State.

The problem of dependency in old age is primarily a State and local responsibility, though we must not overlook its national or interstate aspect. Relatively few persons now reside within the same State throughout their lifetime. Old-age pensions supported exclusively by the State and local governments mean that only the wealthier States and the wealthier communities within those States will actually be able to provide such aid. In other communities old-age pensions can be provided only at the expense of the schools or other essential functions of government. The need for Federal aid is so obvious that it hardly requires statement.

Title I of the social-security bill provides Federal aid to State old-age-pension plans up to 50 percent of their expenditures for this purpose but not exceeding $15 per month per person, and authorizes an appropriation of $49,750,000 for the first year. With the anticipated lag in securing full operation of the State systems, it is estimated that the appropriation needed for the first year will be less than half of what will be needed thereafter. In fact, it is believed that the amount necessary will rise rapidly as the State systems become effective, and that within a few years the Federal Government will have to contribute several times this amount. The actuaries of the Committee on Economic Security have estimated that with the pensions as recommended, the total cost of old-age pensions will mount to $800,000,000 within 10 years, half of which would be borne by the Federal Government. These estimates are probably high, but they indicate the very great financial burden of old-age assistance even upon a moderate scale. They show conclusively the need for Federal aid to the States to make old-age pensions possible.

The bill enumerates a certain number of minimum requirements with which the State old-age pension plans must conform in order to qualify for Federal aid. These provisions, which apply alike to Federal aid for old-age pensions and aid to dependent children, do not authorize the Federal agency to arbitrarily cut off the grants to any State. In fact, these provisions limit very strictly the supervisory powers of the Social Security Board over the States, and provide a maximum of State control in these matters. The Federal standards or conditions included in the law may, indeed, be regarded as minimum conditions, leaving to the States the determination of policies, the detailed administration, the amount of aid which shall be given, and questions of personnel. The proposed bill goes further in granting full discretion and authority to the States than any similar Federal-aid legislation within recent years. What the Federal Government is saying to the States in this legislation is, in effect, we will match your expenditures for these purposes.

The social-security bill also provides that the State old-age-pensions laws must permit the granting of pensions to persons 65 years of age or over, but permits the existing State laws which have a 70-year age minimum to remain in operation until 1940. States may not require more than 5 years' residence during the preceding 9 years and, under the terms of the bill, must not deny pensions to United States citizens who are otherwise qualified. These provisions are designed to liberalize the State laws. With the Federal Government bearing 50 percent of the cost, it is entirely appropriate that the States be required to modify their present long-residence requirements. These were perhaps necessary safeguards so long as the pensions were paid wholly from State funds, but they frequently cause considerable hardship and are unnecessary and unwise with 50-percent Federal support.

The grants in aid to the States for old-age pensions will enable the States already having such laws to make more generous grants and to care for a larger number of their dependent aged persons. They will also stimulate the remaining States to enact such laws. This part of the program wisely builds upon the existing system. It recognizes the primary responsibility of local and State governments for the care of their dependents but concedes that it is a national responsibility as well. It takes into account the variations in standards and in cost of living in different parts of the country and permits the development of old-age pensions designed to meet these conditions. The greatest protection to the Federal Treasury and to all taxpayers in this system is the requirement that the State and local governments assume one-half of the cost. If the Federal Government were to go further and take over the entire problem of old-age pensions, as is advocated by some, it would be contrary to our fundamental political institutions and would place upon the National Government a tremendous financial burden without the protection of local vigilance which will prevail if local taxpayers are required to bear part of the cost.

This is a practical program which can be put into operation without delay. It is well within the financial ability of the Nation and will advance, rather than retard, economic recovery. It will provide care for needy old persons immediately in the 29 States which have such laws, and, in the remaining States, will do so as rapidly as the necessary legislation is enacted. While this program may be attacked on the ground that the old-age pensions are not generous enough, it should be borne in mind that on the scale proposed, they will be the most generous in the world. No limit is placed by the Federal Government on the pensions which any State may pay. The only limitation is upon that part of the pension which will be paid by the Federal Government.

This measure of protection for needy old persons does not represent a new outlay but rather a better method of caring for these persons than the present method of emergency relief.

While the value of old-age pensions as a means of providing for dependent aged persons is well recognized, we must, nevertheless, clearly understand its limitations. It can never be other than a form of public charity, to be granted to persons who are in need. The amounts which can be provided will always necessarily be small. Even upon a moderate scale the financial burden of gratuitous old-age pensions will tend to increase rapidly with the increasing number of old persons and the anticipated increase in dependency. Actuaries of the Committee on Economic Security estimate that within another generation the cost of old-age pensions alone, at an average of $25 per person per month, would amount to over two and one-half billion dollars annually, or nearly as much as the normal operating cost of the Federal Government. If we provide only for these old-age pensions, we may be sure that constant pressure will be exerted always to increase them. In order to avoid this huge cost, it is necessary to set up a system of old-age benefits by which the worker will receive benefits as a matter of right rather than as a public charity and in an amount much more adequate than is possible with gratuitous old-age pensions.

Practically every other country in the world which has established free old-age pensions has also found it necessary to set up a system of old-age insurance. If our constitutional limitations did not prevent, this would be, for us as well, unquestionably the best basis for old-age security. It is an infinitely more satisfactory and self-respecting method from the point of view of the worker. It stimulates thrift.

The old-age pension provisions of this bill contained in title I provide for State participation, and the Federal Government will contribute to the States on a 50-50 basis up to $15 a month per person. The State governments can make the amount as large as they please. They can provide for a pension of $15 or $20 or $30 or $50, but the Federal Government will participate on a 50-50 basis up to $30 per month in the aggregate.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. GREEN. With respect to a State that has no old-age-pension law at present, is there any provision in this measure for these Federal funds to be available until such time as the State passes its law?

Mr. DOUGHTON. No; there are 29 States that now have such laws, and it is supposed that the other States will immediately proceed to enact legislation to conform to the provisions of this bill.

Mr. GREEN. And during the grace period there is no Federal benefit?

Mr. DOUGHTON. No.

Mr. FIESINGER. The gentleman just stated "$30 in the aggregate." Does that refer to the amount that the State provides?

Mr. DOUGHTON. No; the States can go as high as they please.

Mr. FIESINGER. But the Government does not go over $30?

Mr. DOUGHTON. No; the Government will not contribute over $15. The amount to be paid is left to the determination of the State. One State can have one rate and another State a different rate, because in certain sections of the country it takes a larger amount to provide for those dependent and destitute than in other sections of the country.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, has the gentleman reached the point in his discussion where it is agreeable to him to yield for questions?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I would prefer to conclude my statement, but I shall not decline to yield.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one question right there?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The State of New York today is paying $30 a month. Assuming this measure is passed providing $15 by the Government, the State of New York can continue paying the $30, plus $15, bringing it up to a total of $45.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes. There is nothing in this bill that will prevent any State from paying pensions at any amount they desire.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. TERRY. Does not the gentleman feel that if the United States Government recognizes the responsibility as a national one, it would be fairer for the United States Government to pay a certain basic amount and then let the States add to that where they are able to do so? In other words, the richer States could then augment this sum to any extent they saw fit, while in the poorer States that might not have money to add to it, the people of such States would not be deprived of this national aid which we are trying to give them.

Mr. DOUGHTON. If all the burden were placed upon the Federal Government we all know that would be unfair to the States that did participate.

Mr. COX. Would not the effect of a law of that kind manifestly be to put the entire burden on the Federal Government?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Absolutely. More than that, if the Federal Government should make the entire contribution, then, of course, the Government would insist on Federal administration, whereas this bill provides State administration.

Mr. GREEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. GREEN. We have a constitutional provision in my State which says that the State cannot contribute to old-age pensions, but the counties can. Is there anything in this bill that would prevent matching that fund?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. That arrangement could be made, but the bill provides that there must be some participation by the States.

Mr. DOUGHTON. That would have to be done through cooperation by the State and county.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. As I understand, it is necessary for every State to provide for a pension for the aged.

Mr. DOUGHTON. States must do so to receive Federal grants. That is under title I.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Under title I, do I understand that the State must provide as much money as the Government; in other words, must the State provide $15 to match the $15 of the Government?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Oh, yes; it may do more, but it cannot do less and receive Federal aid.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. If the State gives $10, then the Federal Government only gives $10.

Mr. LUCAS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. If I understood the gentleman, a number of States have old-age pensions?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Twenty-nine States and two Territories.

Mr. LUCAS. I understand that it is necessary for the State to pass old-age-pension laws before it can receive aid under title I. If they have a law, and it is not operative, that gives them no right to the fund.

Mr. DOUGHTON. That is correct. Their laws must operate in order to get the Federal aid.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield further for me to ask a question touching title I of the bill?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. COX. As I interpret section 1 of title I, the benefit under the law is altogether on the statement of need.

The bill says:

> For the purpose of enabling each to furnish financial assistance assuring, as far as practicable, a reasonable subsistence compatible with decency and health to aged individuals without such subsistence—

And so forth.

I presume that the benefits under this title are all on the basis of need.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. If the gentleman will permit, the need is to be determined under the State law.

Mr. COX. Yes; and I presume the need of one State establishing one rule of law and of another State establishing another, the general Government, of course, would recognize the law of the State.

Mr. DOUGHTON. That is one of the benefits of State participation. If it were altogether from the Federal Government, it would have to be uniform.

Mr. COX. In the report on the bill I find a statement that there are about seven and one-half million people in the country at this time over 65 years of age. If all of those were to come under the provisions of the law, it would mean an expenditure on the part of the general Government alone of $1,350,000,000 annually. What percentage of the seven and one-half million does the gentleman contemplate will come under the provisions of the law? You say in another place in the report that there are about a million now depending upon the public for charity.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The majority of those are on relief.

Mr. COX. On relief. What percentage of the total seven and one-half million does the gentleman figure would come under the provisions of title I?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I think it is fair to state, and I am sure the chairman will agree, that the best evidence presented to the committee while this matter was given very careful and thorough consideration, is to the effect that experience has shown that about one-third of the people of the age limit may reasonably be expected to be able to qualify eventually. It was also shown to the committee that in some States where they have some of the best and most effective and successful old-age-pension plans now in effect, about one-fourth of those of the age limit have been able to qualify.

Mr. COX. If one-third of the seven and one-half million should qualify, it would mean a present charge upon the General Government of around $500,000,000.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes. Seven and a half million is the number over 65. About 1,000,000 of those are dependent.

Mr. COX. The studies of the committee disclose that probably a third or a fourth of the total would come under the law. If that be true, then it would mean an amount above $400,000,000 to provide for them.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. At the present time there are 29 States and 2 Territories that have old-age-pension laws. The total annual expenditure under the existing laws of the States total $31,000,000 plus. Take, for instance, the State of Ohio. There are eligible for old-age pensions in the State of Ohio 414,000 people. As a matter of fact, after this plan has been in operation for a number of months there are 24,000 people who have qualified under the State law with restrictions that the State legislature throws around the law, and the expenditures there amount to something like $31,000,000 annually.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further on that point?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Table 2 on page 5 of the report shows the number of eligible age, 1930, in the third column, to be 2,330,390. In the column immediately preceding that is shown the number of pensioners and they amount to 180,003. That is out of a total number of eligibles, 2,330,390.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. And might I add that the Ohio rate is practically $14 per month.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. To make an observation in connection with the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky. I wonder if any very safe conclusion can be arrived at from the experience of the States. For example, Michigan has an old-age-pension law, but the legislature in passing the law made very inadequate provision for raising the money with which to pay the pensions, so that the number actually receiving pensions under that law is very insignificant as compared to the number who would be able to qualify to receive them if there was any money with which to pay them. For that reason no one can draw any reasonable conclusion as to the number of persons in the State who might qualify to receive an old-age pension under a proper law.

Mr. COX. That is the thought that I was about to develop. Does not the Committee accept it with certainty that with Federal participation, and with the power of compulsion in a sense, there will be a more liberal grant on the part of the States under the new law than has heretofore been the case?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes; I think it would certainly encourage the States to grant greater benefits to the aged.

Mr. COX. I am wondering just how the gentleman and his committee figured it out that forty-nine and one-half million dollars could be stretched far enough to take care of two and a half million pensioners paid at the rate of $15 per month.

Mr. DOUGHTON. That is only for the first year. It will take time for them to qualify. They will not pay $15 a month to all of them. It does not mean that every pensioner will get $30 a month, half of this from the Federal Government. They may have a home or they may have a small garden and they may not need half of that amount. They may need the full amount. Moreover, it will take some time to get this law into operation and for them to qualify and get on the pension roll.

Mr. COX. The gentleman is making a statement that is informative to me at least. In other words, the gentleman does not understand it to be the intention of this new board that is being set up to compel uniformity of grants on the part of States? In other words, a State might grant a pension of $5 a month to one pensioner and $15 to another and $30 to another?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Oh, absolutely, owing to the need. The State law determines that.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. In States that have old-age-pension laws, where the funds are raised and disbursed by county governments at their discretion, would the people of those States receive old-age pensions under the provisions of this bill?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. WHITE. In States that have old-age-pension laws, where the funds are raised and disbursed by county governments at their discretion, would the people of those States receive old-age pensions under the provisions of this bill?

Mr. DOUGHTON. That will depend upon the State law.

Mr. WHITE. In the State of Idaho, which I represent, we have an old-age-pension law, but we permit the counties to raise the money. The State provides for paying the old-age pensions. Some counties pay and some do not. I would like to know if that State would benefit from the provisions of this act?

Mr. DOUGHTON. It would have to be a State-wide law, operative in all the counties.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. It must be in effect in all of the subdivisions affected, and if it is in all of the subdivisions affected, it must be mandatory. Furthermore, the Federal Government transacts its business with the State agency; makes the Federal contribution to the State agency.

Mr. GREEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. GREEN. In that connection, our legislature is in session now, considering the advisability of amending the constitution so that we can have a general State tax and a State machine to participate. Pending that arrangement, I suppose from the gentleman's remarks it would be impossible for the various county units, provided every county unit did it, to raise its old-age pension or welfare fund, but it must be paid through the same State agency?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. In other words, in section 2 of the bill it is stated in plain language:

> A State plan for old-age assistance must (1) provide that it shall be in effect in all political subdivisions of the State, and, if administered by them, be mandatory upon them.

Then following that provision the bill states there must be a single State agency.

Mr. GREEN. Then the State, in large measure, almost entirely, writes its own provisions in the State old-age pension?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield to my friend, a member of the committee.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I do not believe the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON] has quite answered the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. WHITE]. That is going to be a question that will be asked many times, and I think the gentleman from Kentucky is probably as well informed on this bill as anyone else, and if the distinguished Chairman will permit him to elaborate on that, I think he should do so, because that is a question that will be asked many times. In many States the counties administer the old-age pension. Where this is the practice many counties do not have old-age pensions. Just as in Ohio we have a blind pension. There the blind payments are made by the counties. In the poorer counties the poor blind people get practically nothing. What will this bill do in those States? Is it not true that, for instance, the State of Idaho will have to convene its legislature and pass a law that will be uniform in its application all through the State, and every county will have to pay something?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. If a State permits the county to provide the funds, every county in the State must operate. It must be State-wide in that respect. If they propose to operate through subdivisions it is mandatory upon those subdivisions.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Let us carry that to a conclusion. Suppose in the State of Idaho there are 10 counties, and 5 of them are pretty well fixed and 5 of them have been able to pay a pension in times gone by, and 5 of them have not been able to carry it; but the 5 who have not been able to carry it and the other 5 will have to pay something to establish a system of old-age pensions and at least pay a minimum?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. That is correct. In other words, it must be applicable to all subdivisions of the State. It would not be fair to have rich counties participate and the poor counties which need it most, not participate. It must be State-wide in its application, and if you operate under subdivisions, then all subdivisions must make proper provisions in dollars. It is mandatory upon all the subdivisions.

Mr. DOUGHTON. It is not necessarily uniform in each county in a State, because the needs may be greater in one county than in another county, or in an urban district greater than in a rural district.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I would like to develop that a little further, so that we may conclude it as far as I am concerned at least. Again let us suppose in Idaho there are 10 counties and 5 of them have been able to carry the load. Those five, of course, will be able to continue carrying the load. Suppose they are able to carry $10 a month pension. Suppose over here is a poor county that cannot pay $10 a month but can pay $2 a month, but the rich county will get $10 from the Federal Government and the other county must do something; is that not right?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I think that subdivision 2 of section 2, which calls for financial participation by a State, will take care of, in large degree, the question which the gentleman raises. In other words, there must be some financial participation on the part of the State. If the richer and more wealthy counties are able to carry their load and the poorer counties cannot carry their burden the State may help the latter with such burden. As I understand, it is mandatory upon the State to participate in bearing this burden.

Mr. DOUGHTON. That is a matter that will have to be regulated by the State.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Is it not true that each State could assume the whole burden as a State and then could deal with the counties as it saw fit, except that the treatment would have to be uniform in each county?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The State may look to the subdivisions for the money. But if the State so legislates, it is mandatory upon all such subdivisions.

Mr. DOUGHTON. But it would not necessarily be uniform in every county.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Before we get through I would like to ask the gentleman a further question.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Notice that I said "not necessarily."

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. As I understand the bill, if a State passes a pension law, each applicant must be treated alike under similar conditions; the same conditions would apply and the same sums must be paid under like conditions.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes; under like conditions.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I shall not decline to yield, but if the Members would only read the report, it contains a more detailed explanation of this bill than any Member could give on this floor in half a day. Nevertheless, I shall be pleased to yield.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the gentleman is in position to advise the committee if there has been an expression of the administration's views on the question of State participation.

Mr. DOUGHTON. There has been a very definite and very emphatic expression of the views of the administration on this subject. This is one of the things on which I do not think there would be any compromise so far as the administration is concerned.

Mr. COX. And the whole thing is impossible except upon a basis of that kind.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I believe it will be fair to say that some of us have discussed this very phase of the matter with the President, the question of State participation, and that he is very definite and certain in his view and convictions that there must be State participation. I believe perhaps he has expressed himself further on this question to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. Would it be possible for citizens of the same State to draw different sums of money from the Federal Government even though the entire State was not participating?

Mr. DOUGHTON. They do not draw anything from the Federal Government. The Federal Government makes grants to the States. The State gives the money, it comes through the State. The Federal Government makes the grant to the State and the State determines that.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. But would the money sent to the State by the Federal Government on proper request, on duly established forms, be paid out in different sums to different citizens of the same State?

Mr. DOUGHTON. The Federal Government would not have a thing to do with that. It would depend entirely on the State law. Of course, different citizens of the same State would get different sums, but that is discretionary with the State authorities and is based upon need.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Do I understand that all citizens in one county shall receive the same amount of Federal aid?

Mr. DOUGHTON. No; not at all. That will be determined by the State upon the basis of need. One citizen might be able to half support himself. The bill is intended to supplement that half support so he may have full support.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Is the situation this, that individual need is the basis of determining what a person shall receive?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Absolutely. That is the intent of the law. Of course, we cannot say just what will happen in the administration of the law. It just provides for a grant to the States, but that is the purpose of it.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. I want to get this clear in my mind, for instance. The State of Pennsylvania now pays a maximum pension of $30 a month. Some people receive $15, some receive $10. According to information I received just recently, the Governor has asked $10,000,000 to provide a pension for the aged. If this bill is passed, would it mean that the Federal Government would give $10,000,000 to the State of Pennsylvania?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Not necessarily. The amount contributed by the Federal Government is not based upon the amount of money appropriated or allocated in the State for old-age pensions. There is a limit of $15 a month per individual. Of course, the State may have a larger pension than $15 if it so choose.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. For example, how would the gentleman figure this out: The maximum pension is $30 a month.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman is now speaking of the present law?

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. They are not paying any old-age pension in Pennsylvania now.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Yes; they are.

Mr. FOCHT. Yes; they are.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The report we had at the hearing showed that none were being paid in Pennsylvania at that time.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. But I assure the gentleman they are and have been since last year.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Let us assume that they are, for the sake of argument; what is the gentleman's question?

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. My question is, if the maximum is $30, how would they arrange that if they still retained the $30 maximum?

Mr. DOUGHTON. The Federal Government would pay in any case a maximum of not over $15.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I think the gentleman is correct in his question. If the State of Pennsylvania pays to its citizens for old-age pensions $10 and they do not pay over $30, the Federal Government would match that amount of money.

Mr. DOUGHTON. No; not at all. That might compel the Federal Government to pay as much as $30 in order to match what the State paid. The Federal Government will not contribute over a maximum of $15 per month.

Mr. FULLER. I know that.

Mr. DOUGHTON. It was not clear from the gentleman's statement. The Federal Government will match up to $15. If there were no limit they could go up to $100 in Pennsylvania or any other State as far as that is concerned.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. SIROVICH. Is not this the situation, that the Federal Government will match what the State government gives providing it is not more than $15 per month?

Mr. DOUGHTON. That is correct.

Mr. FULLER. The object of the Pennsylvania law is that they will get a limit of $30, $15 of which will come from the Federal Government, and on that basis the Federal Government will pay half.

Mr. SIROVICH. Some get $5, some get $10, and some get $12, and each case will have to be matched, provided it does not require more than $15 in an individual case.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman from Pennsylvania stated that the pension in Pennsylvania was a maximum of $30.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Yes; but some of the aged get only $10 a month.

Mr. SIROVICH. Our Government gives $15 and that is matched in each case below that amount.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. I know of a man who gets $30 and his wife gets $15.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. What is the age limit in Pennsylvania?

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Seventy.

Mr. FOCHT. They are not paying $30. The law authorizes $30, but the State of Pennsylvania is paying less, and only because they do not have the money.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The law says the maximum is $30, and quite a number in my district are getting $30. That is probably because I am a better politician than the gentleman.

Mr. FOCHT. They have a better administrator in the gentleman's district perhaps.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. The law provides for a maximum of $30.

Mr. FOCHT. That is right.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. May I inquire how the determination is to be made in the individual case as to the amount which that individual is to obtain?

Mr. DOUGHTON. That will be under State law and will be determined entirely by State law.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Will there be different formulas set up in the different States, or will there be one national formula?

Mr. DOUGHTON. No; the National Government will not have anything to do with it. The administration of the law is left entirely to the States.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. The National Government and none of its agencies or instrumentalities will have anything to say about how much the individual gets in a State?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Not a word. The State might set up a system that the Federal Government would not approve, but it will not have the right to say just how much the State should give or not give. Of course, the Federal Government may withhold the appropriation from a State. That would be within its discretion. They would not have any right to say what amount should be paid. That would be left entirely to the State law.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. May I refer to section 2, page 2 of the bill entitled "State Old-Age-Assistance Plans", which covers the situation fully. There are seven provisions set out. In subdivision (a) of section 2 those seven provisions are set out and they apply to the State plans. Subdivision (b) sets out three provisions that must be observed by all these State plans. In effect, it simply means that the State legislature of every State enacts a statute which embraces a plan for that State and these guides that are set out in section 2 have to be observed by the State legislature in setting up the State plan.

Mr. GILDEA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GILDEA. The State of Pennsylvania has been mentioned by two of my colleagues from Pennsylvania. May I say that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is correct. Pennsylvania is not paying old-age pensions because it has not the money with which to pay these pensions. I am just wondering if making the States responsible for the lending of this money is not going to result in the States repudiating their loans just the same as the foreign governments.

Mr. DOUGHTON. That is not a loan. The States do not have to repay this money. It does not have to be repaid to the Federal Government, and there is no obligation on the part of the State. It is not a loan but a grant outright.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina has consumed 1 hour.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield myself 15 additional minutes.

Mr. GILDEA. May I carry that thought a little further? The State of Pennsylvania requires residence in the State or citizenship for 15 years before pensions are granted. In writing a national law should we not seek to correct that situation?

Mr. DOUGHTON. The State law will have to be changed in order to get these benefits because the law may require a residence of not over 5 years during the preceding 9 years.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Section 2 of the bill covers that fully in very simple language.

Mr. GILDEA. You still have State regulations which must be recognized. May I refer to a particular case. A citizen of the State of Pennsylvania for 13 years, whose son died in the World War, was denied insurance.

Mr. DOUGHTON. They would have to change the State law in order to get this Federal benefit.

Mr. GILDEA. They would have to conform with this bill?

Mr. DOUGHTON. They certainly would in that respect.

Mr. KENNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. KENNEY. The money with which to pay the Federal Government's share of these pensions will come from general taxation?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes.

Mr. KENNEY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has just brought into the discussion the matter of the foreign governments. Does the committee intend to discuss on the floor some of the systems the foreign governments use in connection with their old-age pensions?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I do not know enough about them to enter into a discussion concerning their systems.

Mr. KENNEY. Norway has a very admirable plan to pay their pensions. The money is raised there by lottery. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Does the gentleman advocate that in this country? The Federal Government, I am sure, will not care how the State raises its money.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. I want to say to my colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GILDEA], I understood him to say that the State of Pennsylvania does not give an old-age pension. Whether you call it a pension or assistance, I do not think the gentleman meant to say that the State does not give anything. The law was passed, I believe in 1933, and the way they were to obtain the money was from the liquor stores. It is true that all the men and women who made application for a pension did not get it, but at least several thousand are receiving it, and I know this is a fact, because I had something to do with the law. The maximum amount is $30. So they do get a pension, although they might call it relief, in the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. GILDEA. I shall accept the correction with this explanation. They are still considering November applications, and they are 4 months behind in handling the applications.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. I agree with the gentleman, and the reason they are behind is because the people in Pennsylvania did not drink enough booze to pay the pensions.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. If the gentleman will yield, I would suggest that the gentlemen from Pennsylvania get together and have a caucus on this subject before they come in here with their questions.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FOCHT. We have in Pennsylvania a pension law. We do not call it a pension, but call it assistance. We do not call it a pension because we cannot give pensions to those in civil life, and for this reason we call it an assistance fund, and it comes through the mothers' assistance fund, and they administer it. We give $30 a month if we have the money you provide here $15, which will match the State money and will make $45.

Mr. DOUGHTON. If you continue to give $30.

Mr. FOCHT. Of course, we could reduce it. The county will then give $15 and that makes a pretty fair pension.

Now I want to ask my friend on the other side a question. He said that somehow or other Pennsylvania did not have the money. I was not going to say anything about how they get the money or where it is to come from until the gentleman mentioned it. It is to come from the sale of whisky, and I would like to ask him this question: Since they have bought $50,000,000 worth of whisky up there to be sold, with the profit applied to the old-age pensions, why do they not sell the whisky? It is because it is so rotten that nobody will buy it, and they do not show any profit because the people buy their whisky outside, and this is under the new Democratic administration up there. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I shall have to refuse to yield for any further joint debate between the gentlemen from the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question if he will yield a moment.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. WOOD. Since we have finished this discussion of Pennsylvania and whisky, there is some doubt in some minds as to just how this Federal aid is going to be administered. For instance, a State has an old-age-pension law with a minimum of $10 a month and a maximum of $20. If one person is drawing $10 a month from the State, he would then draw $10 from the Federal Government, would he not?

Mr. DOUGHTON. No; he would not draw anything from the Federal Government—not a cent.

Mr. WOOD. I mean there would be a contribution from the Federal Government including the $10.

Mr. DOUGHTON. He would get that through the State.

Mr. WOOD. If he were receiving $30 a month from the State then he would receive an additional $15 a month to augment the $30 from the Federal Government, making a total of $45 a month.

Mr. DOUGHTON. That is correct.

Mr. WOOD. In other words, there was some question about whether a State can participate, although they are paying less than $30 a month.

Mr. DOUGHTON. There should not be any question about that.

TITLE II

The system of direct Federal old-age benefits is included under title II. The benefits payable are based upon the wages of the employee. The minimum benefit is set at $10 per month and the maximum at $85 and the benefits become payable in 1942.

It must be clearly understood that neither Federal aided State old-age pensions nor Federal old-age benefits, taken alone, will be adequate to care for the problem of old-age dependency, a problem which is certain to become greater as time goes on. We cannot wisely adopt one of these measures without the other. We must recognize that what the American citizen wants is not public charity, but an opportunity to care for himself in old age in a self-respecting manner and on a more adequate basis than he can ever hope for through State pensions. Old-age pensions are provided for those who are already old and dependent and those who cannot be covered under the Federal-benefit system in the future.

Titles III and IX deal with unemployment compensation. Title III provides grants in aid to the States for the administration of State unemployment compensation laws. There is authorized under title III to be appropriated during the fiscal year ending 1936, the sum of $4,000,000, and in 1937 and thereafter, the sum of $49,000,000 for this purpose. This will not be an ordinary type of grant in aid, for it is expected that this will be sufficient to pay the entire administrative cost of the State systems.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Will there be anything done for those who are now unemployed or is this for those who are now employed who may become unemployed?

Mr. DOUGHTON. It is for the latter.

Mr. LUNDEEN. It will cover those now employed who become unemployed?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Certainly.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. And who qualify under the State law?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Who qualify under the State law; yes.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I wish to call attention to the fact that the 15,000,000, more or less, and there is disagreement about the number, now unemployed will not be covered by this bill, unless I am mistaken, and if I am I hope the gentleman will correct me.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The gentleman is right.

Mr. LUNDEEN. There will be nothing for those who are now unemployed in this bill and I think there will be bitter disappointment over that phase of the measure.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The gentleman has evidently forgotten the relief measure just enacted, providing over $4,880,000,000 out of the Federal Treasury to help that class of people. The gentleman certainly is not unmindful of the passage of that act and, certainly, the gentleman does not expect the Government to do everything for everybody, which would certainly make it beyond the capacity of the Government to help anybody.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Then I will ask the very able and distinguished gentleman whether, in his opinion, this $4,000,000,000 will take care of the 15,000,000 who are unemployed?

Mr. DOUGHTON. It is intended, of course, to give employment to the employable who are unemployed. It is a relief measure and is intended to take the place of the dole. I think the gentleman will agree that the Government is going a long way, and much further than any government under the sun has ever gone, in its effort in so many directions to help not only the unemployed, but every class of business which is in distress, as well as individual distress.

The gentleman realizes that every burden, physical and economical, cannot possibly be carried on by the Federal Government. It seems to be the opinion abroad in the land that the funds of the Government are inexhaustible.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I wish to observe that I voted for the $4,800,000,000 bill.

Mr. DOUGHTON. And I hope that the gentleman will vote for this bill.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I cannot pledge myself to do that until we are through with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I know the gentleman's humanitarian instincts and I know of his desire to help the unemployed and needy, and I am confident he will vote for this measure.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Judging from the disappointingly small number of people employed as a result of the $3,000,000,000 appropriation of the last Congress, I have my doubts that this $4,800,000,000 bill will help very many of the 15,000,000 now unemployed. If we do not aid them, we shall hear from them.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota a question. His bill, H. R. 2827, I believe is a good piece of legislation, and would relieve the unemployment, would it not?

Mr. LUNDEEN. I dislike to take any more time from the gentleman from North Carolina, but I am certain that it will.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I cannot yield further.

Title IX provides for an excise tax on employers based upon pay rolls of 1 percent beginning January 1, 1936, 2 percent the following year, and 3 percent thereafter. Against this tax, employers may credit payments to State unemployment-compensation systems up to 90 percent of the Federal tax. A few minimum requirements are imposed which State plans must satisfy in order to qualify for credit, the principal one being that the fund shall be used solely for the payment of unemployment benefits. In general, the States are left free to determine the provisions of their unemployment-insurance laws, the scale of benefits which they will pay, and the other features.

The need for unemployment insurance is well recognized. Eighty-five percent of the families on relief are in want because of unemployment. Unemployment, or the fear of unemployment, has been the principal reason for the unfortunate decline of our purchasing power. No greater hazard confronts the American worker today than that of losing his job. Many State and Federal commissions have recommended the enactment of laws along this line for a number of years. But, in spite of this, States have found it impossible to enact such legislation until the Federal Government protects their industries from unfair competition by placing a uniform tax upon industry throughout the country for this purpose. Only one State had enacted an unemployment-insurance law prior to this year, although two other States have already enacted State laws in anticipation of the Federal legislation contained in the bill.

Unemployment insurance is based upon the principle of laying aside reserves during periods of employment to be used in periods of unemployment. It places part of the financial burden upon industry, and in that way provides an incentive for stabilization of employment. The Federal bill does not provide for unemployment insurance but merely makes it possible for the States to do so. Unemployment insurance has been used in many foreign countries for a number of years and no country, once having adopted such a system, has ever abandoned it. In this country unemployment-compensation systems have been operated by a number of labor organizations and large industrial plants.

It is undoubtedly true that what the American citizen wants and needs, above all else, is steady employment, but under modern economic conditions and with the rapid development of machine techniques, it is inevitable that large numbers of workers will be thrown out of work from time to time. Given this situation, it must be acknowledged that unemployment insurance will provide the best means of protecting workers against this greatest of all causes of dependency. It does not place a new burden upon industry, the cost will not be greater than the present cost of unemployment relief; rather, it shifts that cost and distributes it far more equitably than heretofore.

Title IV: I come now to those sections of the bill concerned with security for children. I am told that the present relief rolls carry more than 9,000,000 children under 16 years of age, children who in a few years will be the citizens upon whom the responsibilities of our Government will rest. Many of them have never known a normal secure childhood, never known a time when their father had a steady job. All the measures in the bill may be truly called measures for the protection of American childhood, inasmuch as they protect family life. Even old-age measures, in freeing families of the burden of caring for old people, will enable them to care for their young children more adequately. But there are other children for whom special care is necessary. Many of the children on the relief rolls are in families where there is no breadwinner, where the only head is a young mother who is needed to care for her children. There can be no question that for families of this kind, provision through ordinary public relief is socially undesirable.

Enlightened public opinion has long recognized that the most desirable type of public aid for such families is in the form commonly known as mothers' pensions—that is, aid to dependent children to maintain them in their own homes under their mothers' care. Forty-five States have laws providing for mothers' pensions but many of these States, for lack of funds, have been unable to care for more than a fraction of the families eligible to receive such assistance. Federal aid will permit the mothers' pension type of care to become nationally operative and is particularly necessary in view of the withdrawal of Federal support for unemployment relief.

TITLE V

Another part of the social-security bill dealing with protection of children, title V, provides an appropriation of $3,800,000 for maternal and child-health services under the supervision of the Children's Bureau. The great need for the Federal Government to again assume leadership and lend aid in this field was borne out by the testimony before the committee given by members of the medical profession from all parts of the country. Two million eight hundred and fifty thousand dollars is also provided for Federal grants for services for crippled children, particularly in rural areas where such hospital care is now largely nonexistent. Title V authorizes small appropriations for the protection and care of homeless, dependent, and neglected children, and children in danger of becoming delinquent, and for vocational rehabilitation. These very essential services have again been greatly curtailed during the depression years.

Title VI provides an appropriation of $8,000,000 for grants in aid to the States for the extension of public health services. Only about one county out of every six in this country has a regular full-time health officer. During the depression the State and local expenditures for health services throughout the country have been drastically reduced, despite the fact that the need for them was never greater. It cannot be denied that the first step in a program to reduce the economic cost of sickness and ill health is through the building up of our preventive public health services.

Title VII establishes a social-security board of three members, appointed by the President for overlapping terms of 6 years each. The social-security board will have charge of the administration of the grants in aid to the States for old-age pensions and the administration of the Federal old-age-benefit system. It will also be responsible for the certification of State unemployment-compensation systems and is charged with the duty of making actuarial and scientific studies of the broad problems of social security.

Titles VIII and IX levy taxes designed to finance the major cost of the social-security program. These I have discussed already.

Mr. Speaker, I have only touched upon the more essential provisions in my brief explanation of the bill. There are many sections dealing with questions of administration, and matters relating to the subjects I have enumerated.

This bill is the product of many weeks of laborious effort on the part of the membership of your committee, ably assisted by the splendid and expert personnel of the office of the legislative counsel, the staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue, representatives of the Treasury and Labor Departments, and other branches of the Government. I desire to express my appreciation for the splendid and most valuable assistance they have rendered, in which I am sure the other members of the committee join.

Mr. Speaker, we are today fashioning the foundation stones upon which will rest the happiness and welfare of future generations. Our task is not an easy one, for we have no mileposts to guide us. We are pioneering in a field never before undertaken by any previous Congress. This bill, in my opinion, is a well-rounded-out program, upon whose foundation we can build in the future after we have had an opportunity to observe and study its workings.

While we may not all be in agreement with respect to the many provisions contained in this measure, I am sure we are all in accord with its objectives to bring about the proper solution of the problem our country faces in caring for the needs of those who have already, and who in the future, will have reached the age when they can no longer provide for themselves.

We are building for the future. Let us not weaken that foundation upon which the welfare of future generations must depend. Some think various provisions are too inadequate. I, for one, would far rather start cautiously than to go too far and bring about the collapse of our handiwork in the future. Some would remove certain sections of the foundation supports incorporated in this bill, and are saying we are going too far and placing too heavy a burden upon industry at this time. If that be so, why has not industry opposed this measure. Never during my service in this House have I seen less opposition to a measure, both during the hearings and its consideration for the past several months.

Let me remind those holding this view that industry, along with all others, is today assuming a tremendous burden, which will continue to grow more burdensome year by year unless we adopt a broad rounded-out program, not a piecemeal one, that will eventually bring about the lessening of the burden we now have.

Let us not be swayed by the clamor of those advocating fantastic remedies, or those who hesitate and whose thoughts in the past have been of the favored classes and not the masses.

Today we have a leader in the White House whose every action has demonstrated his concern for the welfare and happiness of the common people—the forgotten men, women, and children of this country.

Let us emulate the foresight and wisdom of our forefathers who builded for the future, as President Roosevelt is building today, by the adoption of his program for social security, by the enactment of this measure.

American conditions today demand courageous action. We cannot safely delay social reforms that are necessary to preserve our economic and political institutions. There is no great reform which has ever occurred which was not looked upon in its time as a bold and perhaps dangerous step. When Columbus set forth with his three small vessels to sail across the uncharted Atlantic and discover a new world, it required the highest courage, the kind of courage which was displayed by our Revolutionary forefathers when they fought the Revolutionary War and our country secured its independence. The progress of America has ever been marked by that great quality of boldness and determination which inspired our pioneer forebears. To bring about a great social reform such as is proposed in this bill requires the same quality of far-sighted leadership. I am confident that in this House, among the elected representatives of the American people, this quality will not be found lacking. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from North Carolina use some more of his time at this time? In case I find it possible to yield some of my time to the gentleman from North Carolina, could he continue a little longer this afternoon and let my side begin tomorrow?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. SCOTT].

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether it will do a great lot of good to talk this afternoon or not. Everybody is ready to go home, and I rather have the idea that most of you have just about made up your minds on how you are going to vote on this bill anyway. If Members have to sit around and listen to 20 hours of debate and hear all sorts of suggestions made they will be so confused by the time debate is over that they will have to fall back on their own fundamental, basic philosophies of old-age pensions. This will mean that everything said in the meantime will be more or less cast aside, and you will vote convictions formed years ago. These convictions, I suspect, are deep-seated. I would not be surprised but that that is the main difficulty in the minds of a lot of Members in this House. Most of us have sort of grown up with certain fundamental concepts and convictions. When we were learning them they were perhaps correct. In the meantime, however, so much has happened, and things have changed so in the past few years that many people are left in a confused state of mind. It is, I know, difficult for a man with settled convictions to change his mind on any subject, no matter what the arguments offered are. It is sometimes difficult to recognize a new idea when it is presented to you. I am not going to find any particular fault with the Ways and Means Committee because of this. They have developed certain convictions through their lifetimes, and it is asking almost too much to have them throw all of those aside and adopt brandnew ideas.

When they were forming their opinions very few people believed in unemployment insurance or old-age pensions. Rugged individualism was the accepted theory. Then, all of a sudden, because of talk, and because of the necessity of the times, unemployment insurance and old-age pensions became fairly respectable. We coasted along with considerable talk and agitation until now we are in a position where everybody is in favor of old-age pensions, or at least with the principle of pensions. But keeping that same idea, that perhaps older, more settled minds cannot progress as rapidly as younger minds, their first reaction is, now, let us keep these pensions just as small as we possibly can; let us keep these benefit pensions down. They come back to those old shibboleths, those old concepts that they have always had and recognized, and say we cannot put something new in because it will disrupt something we have always had. A lot of younger minds in the country and a lot of minds that have been giving considerable study to the subject are already letting those concepts go by the boards. If we cannot do the thing we want to do, which is establish economic security for every citizen in the United States, and still maintain some of the old theories and some of the old institutions we have always known, let us get rid of them, or let us change them in some way or another, so that we can do what we want to do.

I read a story just yesterday that seems to me to illustrate this inability to recognize a new idea. A woman was hiring a new maid, and in the course of the conversation and instructions to the maid she was telling her of the things they were going to have to buy. She said, "Oh, yes; there is one other item that you will have to have in the kitchen, and that is a griller." Most up-to-date kitchens nowadays, I suppose, have grillers. The maid looked at her with a blank expression on her face. The woman said, "What is the matter; don't you know what a griller is?" The maid said, "Sure, I know what it is; it is a big ape that looks like a human being, but if you think I have to have a new one in this kitchen, I am going to quit right now."

Somebody comes along and points out the idea that for the first time in history we have built up an organization that makes it possible for us to produce wealth in such quantities that everybody could live on a decent standard of living. That is hard to grasp, because it has not been true until recently. Too many Members in this House formed their convictions during the era of scarcity and cannot think in terms of abundance. Our technological development has tended to throw men out of employment, but at the same time it is tending to increase the national income, the wealth that is produced each year. We then run up against the question of how are we going to use what technology can produce and give it to people who cannot work because of technology. Perhaps one way that we could do it is with old-age pensions or unemployment insurance, but they must be adequate to maintain the recipients in decency and comfort. Now, with scarcity-era convictions, the only way we seem to be able to accomplish it is to try to take it away from those that have it and give it to those who do not have it, and the whole argument in favor of this particular bill and in opposition to a more liberal pension bill is that we cannot levy a high enough tax on legitimate business as it exists under this system to get enough money to pay a larger old-age pension. That is the argument that has been used against all of these plans that call for higher pensions. Where are you going to get the money? Which brings me back to the contention in the first place that people have talked and legislated and studied and analyzed money for so long that the only kind of money they know anything about is the kind they have always had; the only way they can attack the problem is by saying what will it do to sound money?

This argument came up once before when we were talking about bonus legislation: "If you put out this currency, you wreck the monetary system. You do not have sound money any more." Well, after all, money simply buys the things that we produce, as a medium of exchange. If you recognize the fact that we have not anywhere near the same kind of sound money that we had before we went off the gold standard, that that kind of sound money has ceased to exist, then we can get a different slant on the money question and use it as a medium of exchange to transfer those things that we produce into the hands of the people who want to consume them. If we are going to insist upon maintaining and keeping the old institutions that we have long known, that will be impossible. I doubt whether we can take enough from those who get to give to those who do not get to maintain them on a decent standard of living. But that does not keep us from accomplishing the original purpose of guaranteeing economic security. Once earlier in our history, when they were digging the Panama Canal, they ran up against an epidemic of yellow fever. They could not go ahead with the digging as long as the epidemic existed. They could not keep their workmen alive. Nobody was foolish enough, however, to say that the way to cure the epidemic was to take the patient and treat him and try to cure him. They went to the seat of the difficulty and eliminated the cause. They said, "If we want to go ahead, we have to prevent the epidemic, and the only way to do it is to get rid of the mosquitoes, and the only way to do that is to dry up the swamps." Can we not attack our economic difficulties in the same way? The trouble is we have been getting the poor fellow after he has been knocked down, getting the unfortunate victim after he has been thrown out of the economic system and cannot earn a living any more, and trying to do something for him. Our solution of this difficulty, it seems to me, should go back to the thing that knocked him out. I mean the changes in our economic system that make it impossible for men to get jobs. It does not make any difference what particular phase of this subject we take up for discussion, if you think it over, we get right back to the money question every time. The money question today is the seat of each one of our particular difficulties.

I am in sympathy with the idea of old-age pensions and with unemployment insurance, but you cannot get them if you are going to insist on maintaining some of these eighteenth-century ideas on the money question. [Applause.] The funny part about it is that we were so willing to move clear up to the twentieth century as far as our technological development is concerned, but when somebody comes along with an invention in the social field we turn it down because our minds cannot grasp a new idea.

Mr. LUNDEEN. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. LUNDEEN. If one does come along with some new and fundamental idea in the social field, then it is a radical, a "red", a socialistic idea and should be turned down at once?

Mr. SCOTT. Oh, there are a lot of us who have ceased to be worried by names and epithets. We always get that when we attempt to secure progressive legislation. Every liberal thinker has been called names. We get used to it.

May I suggest to the Members that in the consideration of how much money we can give in pensions they make constant reference to a book called "The Chart of Plenty", by Harold Loeb and associates. It is a preliminary report of the national survey of potential product capacity and cannot, must not be ignored.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield, from the 10 hours allotted to me, 1 hour to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON].

Mr. DOUGHTON. I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MCREYNOLDS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 7260, the social security bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

CARL L. BERNAU—VETO MESSAGE (H. DOC. NO. 153)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith, without my approval, H. R. 2678, "An act for the relief of Carl L. Bernau."

This bill authorizes the President to convene a court of inquiry to conduct a reinvestigation of the facts and circumstances attending the trial and conviction by general court martial of Capt. Carl L. Bernau, Quartermaster Corps, and that he be afforded the same rights and privileges before said court of inquiry as if he were still in the military service.

In view of the facts set forth in the accompanying letter from the Acting Secretary of War, I am unable to sign this bill.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 11, 1935.

The SPEAKER. The objections of the President will be spread at large upon the Journal.

Mr. ROGERS of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I move that the message, together with the accompanying papers and the bill, be referred to the Committee in Military Affairs and ordered printed.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. ROGERS].

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. CONNERY, for 4 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. HOOK, for 10 days, on account of official business.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I addressed the House concerning the acute situation with reference to schools in Oklahoma. At that time I read a part of the testimony given before the Committee on Education by Federal Relief Administrator, Hon. Harry Hopkins, in which Mr. Hopkins stated that no rural schools in Oklahoma had closed because of lack of sufficient funds to keep those schools open. I was present at the hearing and questioned the statement by the Administrator. Since that time I have presented Mr. Hopkins a telegram from Hon. John Vaughan, State superintendent of public instruction for Oklahoma, advising that schools have actually closed and many others were due to close this week unless Federal funds became available.

The Oklahoma delegation met with Administrator Hopkins yesterday and, I am glad to say, he agreed to keep schools in Oklahoma open for the full normal term. Our Oklahoma Legislature recently made an appropriation of $1,250,000 to aid our schools. But this was $700,000 short of the amount needed, so I am advised, to keep the schools of our State open for the full term. I am sure that the citizens residing in the 1,800 school districts in Oklahoma that were about to close short of the normal term and the 250,000 children attending those schools, as well as the 6,700 teachers affected, will appreciate this eleventh-hour assistance from the Federal Government.

But this does not solve our problem in Oklahoma. It is only temporary relief; and I again call your attention to the fact that Congress ought to take some affirmative action. Unless it does, we are likely to be faced with a similar situation next year.

Mr. Hopkins told the delegation in Congress from Oklahoma when we called on him that the school problem should be taken care of by Congress and should not be handled as a relief measure. The record shows he told the committee practically the same thing. But although the Committee on Education has had extended hearings, it has so far failed to agree on any Federal-aid bill. In so doing it has refused to give Members of Congress an opportunity to vote for permanent Federal-aid relief. Certainly it is time Congress assert its authority and do something constructive for the schools of the Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. BARBOUR presented the following resolution adopted by the House of Assembly of the State of New Jersey, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

THE ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY-NINTH LEGISLATURE
OF THE STATE OF NEW JERSEY,
Assembly Chamber, Statehouse, Trenton, N. J.

Resolution by Mr. Pascoe, of Union County (introduced and adopted Apr. 1, 1935)

Whereas the people of New Jersey pay into the Federal Treasury in taxes over $96,000,000 annually, and in allocating the same only about $52,000,000 is returned to the State of New Jersey, including appropriations for emergency relief; and

Whereas we learn from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 22, 1935, that in making appropriations for emergency relief to the various States there are several States which receive a vastly greater percentage of their relief requirements from the Federal Government than does our State of New Jersey; and

Whereas such a plan is manifestly unfair and inequitable to the people of New Jersey as compared with the citizens of other States; and

Whereas there are some one hundred and twenty-five municipalities in our State which have defaulted in whole or in part on their municipal obligations or are using scrip to pay their expenses, and the imposition of additional taxes to raise money for emergency relief will further aggravate this financial situation: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this House of Assembly for the State of New Jersey does hereby request our United States Senators and Congressmen to support the request of Governor Hoffman and that they do present the above facts to the Federal Director of Emergency Relief and ask for a more equitable distribution of Federal taxes paid by the people of New Jersey, particularly emergency relief funds; we ask this in the interest of the overburdened taxpayers of our State; and be it still further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded forthwith to the United States Senators and each Congressman from New Jersey and to the Governor of New Jersey.

LESTER H. CLEE,
Speaker of the House of Assembly.

Attest:

FREDERICK A. BRODESSER,
Clerk of the House of Assembly.

I hereby certify that the above is a true and correct copy of a resolution adopted by the house of assembly April 1, 1935.

FREDERICK A. BRODESSER,
Clerk of the House of Assembly.

Mr. NORRIS presented the following resolution of the Senate of the State of Nebraska, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

Resolution memorializing the President of the United States, the Secretary of War, the Chief of the General Staff, the Chief of the Air Corps, our Senators and Congressmen in Washington to consider some appropriate location in the State of Nebraska as the site for an interior Army air base contemplated under House bill 4130

(Introduced by Senators Frank J. Brady, Archie C. O'Brien, R. C. Van Kirk, and Ivan H. Mattson)

Whereas section 72–211, Compiled Statutes Supplement, 1933, makes available public lands in the State of Nebraska for radio monitor stations and other public purposes; and

Whereas the central location of the State of Nebraska geographically justifies substantial consideration for the establishment of an Army air base as contemplated under House bill 4130, now pending before the National Congress, by virtue of its absolute centralization on the present transcontinental air route; and

Whereas meterological conditions throught the entire year justify a preference for Nebraska in connection with all season flying as contrasted with other territories and localities; and

Whereas the experience of present air mail operators across Nebraska, where pioneer organization of all air mail in the United States was founded, it being on this specific route through Nebraska where first night air mail was flown; and

Whereas statistics show that these air-mail operators fly an annual completed schedule for each year of operation an average of 97 percent for each completed schedule; and

Whereas the maximum altitude above sea level in Nebraska will not exceed the figure that would preclude sea-level performance of any aircraft; and

Whereas the general terrain along the present transcontinental air route across the entire extent of Nebraska naturally follows the Platte River Valley, which greatly enhances aircraft operation; and

Whereas the State of Nebraska affords along this transcontinental air route a grazing section which can be obtained by purchase for military air-base uses at a minimum figure; and

Whereas the seasonal variations for temperature in Nebraska are of sufficient extreme to acclimate the personnel to any flying conditions; and

Whereas the State of Nebraska has splendid railroad facilities from the Gulf oil fields for the expeditious supply of aircraft fuel and lubricants: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Nebraska in fiftieth regular session assembled:

1. That this senate deems it of immediate importance that the attention of the Federal Government be directed to the peculiar availability of the State of Nebraska for the establishment of a military air base pursuant to the provisions of House bill 4130, now pending in the Congress of the United States.

2. That the Lieutenant Governor be directed forthwith to forward a copy of this resolution properly authenticated and suitably engrossed to Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States; to George H. Dern, Secretary of War; to Gen. Douglas MacArthur, Chief of the General Staff of the Army; to Maj. Gen. B. D. Foulois, Chief of the Air Corps; and to each Senator and Congressman representing the State of Nebraska in the Congress of the United States; to the end that the peculiar availability of the State of Nebraska for consideration as a military air base be called to the attention of those Federal officials to whom will be committed the selection of the same.

Mr. NORRIS also presented the following resolution of the House of Representatives of the State of Nebraska, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

GOVERNMENT MARKETING CORPORATION—ADDRESS BY SENATOR FRAZIER

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a copy of a very interesting speech delivered by Senator LYNN J. FRAZIER, of North Dakota, at a luncheon given by the People's Lobby in Washington on March 30, 1935, and broadcast by the National Broadcasting Co., on Senate bill 1736, which would set up a Farmers' and Consumers' Financing Corporation. Since the measure discussed by Senator FRAZIER is one in which the people of the country are much interested, I ask unanimous consent that the speech be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate bill 1736 sets up a Farmers' and Consumers' Financing Corporation. This corporation would have the power to regulate the prices of farm products from the producers to the consumers.

Under our existing marketing system the producers of farm products are forced to sell at a price over which they have no control and usually below cost of production, and the consumer buys at prices fixed by someone else and usually much too high as compared with the price the producer receives. In short, the producer is robbed in the price he receives, and the consumer is robbed in the price he pays. The spread between farm prices and city prices is too wide. The farmer gets about 35 cents of the consumer's dollar, where he should get at least twice that amount. There is urgent need for an economical and efficient marketing system.

A last month's issue of the Consumer's Guide, issued by the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, states that "never before in this country have so many people been unable to buy food and the simple necessities of life as in the past 2 years." It might also be said that there was never a time in the history of this country when the people who produce the food products and other necessities were so hard up as they have been the past 2 years, and all because of the fact that they have had to sell their products below cost of production. No business can be successful unless it gets cost of production and at least a little profit. Farmers by the hundreds of thousands have lost their homes and land.

Strange as it may seem, during the past 2 years, when such vast numbers of people have been out of employment, when farmers have been going broke by wholesale, when millions of our people could not buy the simple necessities of life, when there has been more of actual want and hunger than in any other like period in the history of our Nation, there have been more food products deliberately destroyed than in all the preceding life of our country. During the past 2 years of misery and want the big companies and corporations that have handled farm products have made good profits. While the poor have been getting poorer the rich have been getting richer.

I want to mention a few of these companies. The National Biscuit Co., in 1933 and 1934, made a net profit of $26,592,000; the National Fruit Co. made a net profit of $21,290,000; Armour & Co., meat packers, made a net profit of $19,446,000; the Borden (milk) Co. made a net profit of $9,136,000; the National Dairy Corporation made a net profit of $13,603,000; the Corn Products Refining Co. made a net profit of $21,207,000; the U. S. Tobacco Co. made a net profit of $6,807,000; and the Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co., in its last two annual reports, showed a net profit of $43,210,000—these profits during the 2-year period of the hardest times our Nation has ever known. I submit there is a need of regulation of prices.

The income-tax returns for 1933 show an increase of those who had a million dollars or more net income over the 1932 returns by 26. That is, in 1933 there were 26 more in the million-dollar, or over, net-income bracket than there were in 1932. In spite of these profits by the handlers and processors of food products, Secretary Wallace is quoted by the papers this week as saying that the rise in food prices has not been excessive; that the increase has only kept pace with the rise in national income.

The Secretary says: Prices are not excessive; the increase in price of food products has only kept pace with the rise in national income—it would be more logical if put the other way, for certainly the rise in income of the companies I have mentioned has kept pace with the rise in the price of food products, and then some. Here in the National Capital there was a rise in prices of food products noticeably when the 10-percent reduction of Federal employees' salaries was restored. They take all the traffic will bear.

During the past 5 years, income from agriculture has been only 8.8 percent of the national income, although the agricultural population is approximately 25 percent of the total number of people. The new-deal agricultural program aims to cut down the production of farm products to the amount needed for home consumption, and the farmers have been given so-called "benefit payments" to recompense them for reducing the farm-crop acreage; yet recent figures from a Government authority show that 51 percent of the imports that came into this country in 1934 were agricultural products, and many of them in direct competition to our own farm products. There was imported in 1934 grains and preparations from grains to the value of $33,212,000; dairy products, $10,865,000; meat products, $12,812,000; vegetables and preparations, $16,000,000; hides and skins, $116,519,000 worth; tobacco, unmanufactured, $24,932,000 worth.

In the past year, over 10,000,000 bushels of rye have been imported which has had the effect of keeping down the price of domestic rye. Some comparison of the cost of bread made from wheat flour and from rye flour may be of interest. The Department of Agriculture gives the following figures as of date of February 15 of this year:

	Cents
Average price of 1-pound loaf rye bread	8.7
Average price of 1-pound loaf white bread	8.3

Farm prices on rye per bushel of 56 pounds, 69.3 cents; wheat prices per bushel of 60 pounds, 87.9 cents; and wholesale price of rye flour per barrel at Minneapolis, $4.244; and wholesale of wheat flour, standard patent, was $7.281 per barrel. Although rye flour is $3 less per barrel than white flour, yet bread from rye flour sells for more than white bread. The average cost of ingredients going into a pound loaf of white bread made by a typical formula is 3.06 cents, and the cost of the flour is 2.14 cents. The approximate amount the farmer gets for the wheat that makes the flour for a 1-pound loaf is 1 cent, and the average price of a 1-pound loaf of bread is 8.3 cents. During the past 10 years the price of a 1-pound loaf of bread of the best grade here in Washington has been 9 cents, and the price of wheat to the farmer has varied from 25 cents per bushel to $1.25 per bushel. The price of the wheat or rye has little to do with the price of bread, and that is literally true of the prices of many other farm products.

If this bill to regulate prices from producer to consumer becomes a law, it is believed that the price to the producer can be increased to an amount based on cost of production and fair profit, and the price to the consumer not increased, and in many cases lowered by eliminating the unnecessary middlemen and also by eliminating unnecessary profits. Recently here in Washington Maine potatoes, for which the grower was receiving 12 cents per bushel, were retailing at the rate of $1.32 per bushel. Radical adjustments and changes must be made. There is no logical excuse for continuing to rob the farmer at one end of the game and continuing to rob the consumer at the other end of the game. The producers and consumers should organize and write the rules of the game and have a fair regulation of prices.

ISSUES BEFORE AMERICA—ADDRESS BY SENATOR WHEELER

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a radio address delivered on April 8 last by my colleague, the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], the subject being Issues Before America.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In the minds of some, 1929 was a golden era. Optimism ran even higher than securities on the stock exchanges. But those were careless, slipshod days. Credit had been inflated out of all reason, partly by the overcapitalization of our corporations. When a certificate of stock or a bond was issued to you and you borrowed money on it at the bank, or if you bought it on a margin, you were inflating the credit, and the indispensable widows and orphans, and the bootblacks and scrub women who were buying watered securities were helping in their little way to inflate the credit of the Nation.

When all this credit inflation, which in fact was really only the creation of a fantastic and impossible debt, started to topple over, big business rushed to the Government and borrowed the taxpayers' money for the purpose of prolonging the day of reckoning, which, in my judgment, has yet to come.

Business and financial leaders of prominence issued weekly interviews telling how much bigger and better things were getting all the time. Why, nothing could stop us in our forward march.

I happened to notice in the paper the other day where one of these men just returned from Europe, and when interviewed about conditions, shook his head gloomily, and uttered words of despair. Now, that is the most hopeful sign of the end of the depression that I have yet seen, because this man was wrong so many times in 1929, when things were getting bigger and better, and was wrong so many times during 1930, 1931, and 1932, when he told us that prosperity was just around the corner.

These same high priests are still with us, and they honestly believe that we should let things work out with no Government interference except Government loans. They do not want reforms. Crazy speculation is in their blood and nothing would make them so happy as to be allowed to build up another 1929. But, my friends, their usefulness—and I am admitting that in the past they have been useful—is over. The day of frontiers is over and we must settle down to living the fullest possible life with our resources.

Friends, we have something far more important before us today than any feeble attempts to reassure the public that all is well. We have something on our hands that is infinitely more of concern to our welfare than any minor patching up of the old machine.

America is at this moment on the threshold of very vital and far-reaching decisions. Where do we want to go? The decision is up to us. Do we want to do what some strong groups contend for and abandon our foreign trade for economic nationalism? I can hear some of my listeners say we want to maintain our high-tariff walls and at the same time to get all the international trade. That is impossible. There is only one way that we can sell our surpluses abroad and that is by permitting other nations to trade with us. We must decide on a definite policy.

Secondly, do we want to go back and have money of redemption and a metallic base for it? If we do, then we must face the fact that there isn't enough gold in the world to meet the needs of commerce and that we must remonetize silver. Or do we want to abandon the metallic base entirely and depend on a managed currency? If we remonetize silver, we will help the manufacturer by preventing the dumping of oriental goods over our tariff barriers.

The trouble with the American political life has been that during the war and since the war up to 1929 so many people were prosperous that they did not stop to figure out what was bringing about that temporary prosperity. We felt that we were God's chosen people and that somehow in His divine wisdom He had picked us out for special attention, when suddenly in the autumn of 1929 we were face to face with the greatest economic catastrophe of modern times, either for this country or any other.

Now, I haven't time in the few minutes that has been allotted to me tonight to point out some of the danger signals that lie in whatever route we choose on these questions. Irrespective of which fork in the road we take, the burning issue before America today is whether we are going to allow monopolies and other large aggregations of economic power to continue to dominate our whole social, economic, and political life.

This issue has its roots in the fact that 96 percent of we American sovereigns own only 15 percent of the wealth; in the fact that 1 out of every 6 persons is dependent upon Government relief for his very livelihood; in the fact that 11,000,000 people are unemployed. Either industry itself must see that more money gets into the hands of the people in the form of purchasing power or it will have to be a function of the Government to do as they are doing now; that is, taxing industry and placing the proceeds in the hands of the needy in the form of relief. If we do this, we are verging onto fascism, which would, to my mind, be worse than unfortunate. It would be so because fascism implies the strong hand of a leader, censorship in the press, on the radio. And I don't think that there is any man capable of being dictator of the United States of America, be he Herbert Hoover or Franklin D. Roosevelt, or anyone else. We have too precious a heritage of freedom and democracy to intrust it to fascism, communism, or any other ism that implies centralization of too much power in the hands of any one individual.

Big business gives us a good enough example of the evils which might attend this course. From 1920 to 1929 no sacrifice was too great to make to centralize power in the hands of fewer and fewer corporations, controlled by fewer and fewer individuals. In 1909 the 200 largest nonbanking corporations had assets of only $26,000,000,000. In 10 years, by 1919, these assets had reached 43.7 billions, or an increase of 63 percent. In the next 10 years, from 1919 to 1929, they increased to $81,000,000,000, or a gain of 85 percent in that period.

These 200 largest corporations would, if the rate of growth from 1924 to 1929 were applied in the future, in 30 years absorb all corporate activity and practically all business activity. These 200 largest corporations are directed nominally by about 2,000 men. But most of the directors are inactive, many of them are dummy directors. It is safe to say that only a handful of men, somewhere in the hundreds, control half our corporate wealth. The other day Chairman Jesse Jones, of the R. F. C., testifying before my committee in the Senate, stated that the railroads were controlled by the bankers. Other testimony showed that the banker control was almost entirely divided between just two banking firms. What is true of the railroads is also true of the life-insurance companies and the utilities in just the same way. I have no doubt that it is true of most of the rest of the 200 corporations. This shows that while half of the corporate wealth is controlled outright by a handful of men, at least the major share of these men may be controlled in turn by less than a half dozen investment bankers.

The corporate form was originally one by which private business was conducted by an individual. It is now a means whereby some financial operators have exercised their power to glut their selfish ambition. It is a means whereby these operators, entirely without investment stake of their own, put the risks of their own bad judgment on thousands of part owners—the stockholders, from Maine to California—while taking out for themselves the profits, in the form of salaries and bonuses, that accrue from their good judgment.

In its original form the corporate device served a very necessary function and was a fine thing, but I say to you business units of the size of these 200 corporations have no place in our economy. In them are all the objectionable features of Government ownership and state socialism, except that they are in no way responsible to the public interest. They lend themselves to the maldistribution of wealth and purchasing power. They tend to stifle private initiative. They foster nepotism in its worst form. They deliberately suppress inventions and new processes so that they can preserve obsolete and uneconomical machinery and plants. They are bureaucracy plus. Their managements, like the Hapsburgs and other royal families, tend to be self-perpetuating, because by wide dispersion of the stock ownership, the use of proxies and holding devices, they can remain in control with only a minimum of stock. Economic democracy under them is an impossibility when they own around 40 percent of all business wealth. Their influence, however, does not stop at ownership. They control newspapers.

There is no way of estimating how much wealth they actually and effectively control in addition to what they own. Employees and people dependent upon their favors have little more democracy than did the serfs under the feudal system. They can go out and vote, yes, but even in this their economic dependence upon these companies is such that they do not dare in some instances to disobey a mandate to take sides in a particular issue.

I think it would be very enlightening just at this point to read an editorial from the Electrical World, semiofficial publication of the public utilities. In the list of 200 largest corporations which I have mentioned, 52 are public utilities. I quote briefly from the editorial, which is entitled "Light Up with Politics":

"Upon a platform of public interest, utility men as taxpayers, as citizens, as representatives of employees and investors, and as public-service suppliers, must make politics their major concern. Every executive or manager in each community served must devote his individual efforts to making the citizens and the politicians friends instead of enemies. * * * These utility men must come to know intimately the present municipal officials and State and national legislators, also those who will attain these political positions in the future, and they must be able to convince these men of their political impartiality. * * * Success in politics depends on human relations, and these have their greatest center in the homes of the citizens of each locality. Utilities should translate public service into political service also by taking local action adequate to meet present needs. Local tickets should be slated and local platforms written at once for each community."

How much effect the lesson for utilities contained in this editorial has had can best be judged by the campaign against the public-utility holding company bill which I have introduced in the United States Senate.

I will be the first to admit that these corporations have every right to spread their gospel in any way they see fit, but I strenuously object to the masquerading of their own selfish interests under the garb of concern for the poor dear public. They have the right to voice their opinions in the public forum, and I would be the last to say that they should be deprived of it in any way, shape, or form. But when they are openly avowing that they are out for all they can get, then I think that the public is entitled to know just where they stand, so that when the representatives of the people are called upon to choose between selfish propaganda and the public interest they can make an honest choice without thought of political expediency and knowing that the public appreciates the real issues involved.

Any idea that these 200 great combinations of capital can be effectively regulated in the public interest under any device we have yet discovered is wishful thinking. When any reform legislation comes up in Congress these combinations descend in a body and lobby furiously against it. They tell their stockholders that they will be ruined, they order their employees out to spread the sad news that everyone will be ruined. They cause a flood and barrage of letters to be written to their Representatives and Senators. If we get any legislation through at all it is finally so full of loopholes that they can get around it.

These corporate managers prate to you that you are losing your liberty under the new deal. I am sure that none of you is being taken in on just whose liberties they are referring to—certainly it isn't your liberties. Why, in their rush for size they take men from the farms and small towns and crowd them together in huge industrial centers. They make them dependent absolutely on a highly specialized job, because they know that if the worker can do only one thing and if he is set down with his family in a place where there is only one thing to do he is absolutely dependent upon that job, no matter what the pay, no matter what the hours of work. If they want to cut costs they lay off men, put them in the bread line.

That is where the bulk of the relief load is going today, to people who had been slaves to the routine of mass production.

If corporate growth goes on unchecked we won't have to worry about the Government taking them over—they will be the Government. They will take over the Government.

Lately there has been a trend of thought which has felt that there should be a decentralization of these combinations of power, a feeling that with smaller units real ability would be more surely brought out and individual initiative restored to many capable people who are practically servants today. Certainly it seems to me to be the only alternative to Government ownership of industries, if not fascism. If, as we have every reason to believe, their assets increase so that in 20 or 25 years they own all business wealth, they will have to be merged with the Government. We can have no other alternative, nothing else can happen, because if they own all business wealth they will then be the Government.

This is a second choice that we cannot escape. It is perhaps not so pressing at this moment as the choice we must make between nationalism and internationalism, but it is none the less inevitable, and the sooner we make it the less painful will be the process of readjustment. Regulation has broken down. Prosecutions under the Sherman Trust Act are largely a thing of the past. There is one way to bring it about, however, and that is by graduated taxation. If the tax is not confiscatory, but getting higher in the larger ranges of capital structure, only those large corporations who can demonstrate that their size makes them more efficient will be able to avoid vountarily breaking up into smaller units. It will give the little business man a chance to compete.

In conclusion, let me say to you that many sincere and honest citizens have viewed with alarm the enormous response which greets such movements as the Townsend old-age pension plan, Senator LONG's share-the-wealth plan, E. P. I. C., and others like them. Many people feel that there is something subversive about them, that they faintly are un-American and communistic. Even if they do cause some newspaper publishers to see "red" behind every tree and bush, to a serious student of history they are the signs of regeneration of thought in the American people.

We ought to welcome the mental energy in all the plans for recovery springing up throughout the country. Out of this so-called "radicalism" of the past has come every progressive change in our economic and political system. Practically every important development of the last 20 or 30 years derives from some ridiculed "ism" of the Populists or other equally forgotten party which preached the doctrine 15 years before.

The radicals of yesterday are the conservatives of today. There is nothing more disrespectful of our own maturity and national intelligence than a fear that we cannot prevent ourselves being taken in by every "ism" that comes along. We need Justice Holmes' grown-up courage and faith to believe in "free trade of ideas" and that "the test of truth is its ability to get itself accepted in the market place."

To business men who are afraid, remember the United States is still the most conservative nation in the world.

These grumblings from the underprivileged 96 percent of the population are entirely natural. One can hardly expect a man with an empty stomach to remain long incurious about the economic forces which are keeping his stomach empty.

You people who believe that you can scotch the Townsend plan or "share the wealth" by merely pointing to the technical defects in the proposals for carrying them out are deluded. In order to prevent a much more drastic reorganization of the system than most people can even imagine at this time, we must have more than scoffing. We must decide two things and decide them quickly. The first is, What place is the United States going to occupy in the world picture? The second is, Do we want either private or public fascism, or do we want industrial and economic democracy?

The American people must give their answer to both of these, and the sooner the ship of state gets to sailing a charted sea the better it will be for all of us.

ECONOMIC CONDITIONS—ADDRESS BY BENJAMIN C. MARSH

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a radio address delivered by Benjamin C. Marsh, executive secretary of the Peoples' Lobby, at Washington, D. C., on Saturday, March 30, 1935.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

THE WASHINGTON MESS

(By Benjamin C. Marsh, executive secretary of the People's Lobby)

Washington is in a mess partly because the new deal is attempting to restore former property values and property income, and with the concentration of ownership of property and of income this precludes sufficient purchasing power to the masses to permit a decent standard of living.

The new deal is Government subsidized State capitalism.

To save creditors the Government last year loaned $6,161,000,000, which was $2,907,000,000 more than in 1933.

Two years ago this month, when the President took office, the capital structure of corporations was probably about $100,000,000,000 too high, asking price for land at least $60,000,000,000 too high, debts at least twice what the people could carry, or interest rates nearly double what we could stand. The write-down since has been small.

In 1932, out of the total national income paid out, $48,952,000,000 $17,361,000,000, or nearly two-fifths, was paid as property return, dividends, interest, rents, royalties, and entrepeneurial withdrawals.

About 1 percent of the families received about one-ninth of the total national income, and nearly one-fifth of the total returns to property in 1932; and they paid the least taxes in proportion to ability to pay, and real benefits conferred by government. That is true today.

The effort is made to raise commodity prices to attempt to validate property prices and debt structure of the 1926 level. Since this handful of people own this property and much of the debt, the masses of the people are compelled to reduce the amount and variety of their consumption; and poverty, unemployment, and underconsumption continue, and will continue until excess prices or valuation of all sorts of property—land, capitalization, and debt—are written down or written off.

Government will have to do this. Inflation by silver purchase or otherwise would merely shift debts and create new debts of high land values and stock prices.

Profits alone were not such a serious item in 1932, for dividend payments were only $2,590,000,000 and the net income of all corporations reporting net income was only $2,153,112,819.

Interest payments, however, were $5,506,000,000 and production charges on account of private retention of ground rents considerably more, probably at least $6,000,000,000.

Devaluation of the dollar has meant compelling the propertyless or small-propertied classes to pay debts and become the victims of others' misfortunes.

The Government's $2,800,000,000 profit on devaluation came out of the pockets of consumers.

The total increase in wages paid and in farmers' income during the past 2 years is only about as much as governments have spent on relief and credit for public works and enterprises.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation, started under President Hoover, was chiefly an effort to save bankrupt concerns from taking their medicine and to compel the masses to take their medicine for them.

The total authorizations of the R. F. C. to February 28 this year for activities of the Corporation, other than advances to Government and for relief, were about $5,000,000,000, of which only about half has been repaid, despite devaluation of the dollar and an increase of about one-half in the national debt.

The administration's pending banking bill does not socialize credit—for that means using credit to increase consumption. This bill carries on the validation through Government credit, of overcapitalization and of excessive values, by permitting loans up to three-quarters of what a Presidential appointee decides is a sound basis.

This bill is an attempt to restore the imbalance of the 1926 concentration of ownership of that year when the Federal Trade Commission reported 1 percent of the people owned about three-fifths of the national wealth and 13 percent owned about nine-tenths.

The Supreme Court's decision on the gold clause apparently knocked into a cocked hat the century-old decision in the Dartmouth College case upholding the validity of contract. Nothing can for long be held unconstitutional which is necessary to save our Nation.

The public-works bill carrying about $4,000,000,000 for public works to be administered by the President will be a life-saver for landowners. Much of the general improvements to be constructed, not including all housing, should be assessed upon property benefited thereby, but this has not been done. For the 18 months, April 1933 to January 1935, the value of materials ordered under the P. W. A. was $701,000,000, and total pay rolls only $360,000,000, about half as much. The average number of men directly employed in 1934 was about 450,000, and 170,000 indirectly. The public-works bill will compel workers to enrich landowners and business interests as a condition of getting work to escape starvation. Rear Admiral Peoples testified that in slum clearance, labor would get 28 percent of cost; on national-highway construction, 40 percent; on grade crossings and rural electrification, 30 percent; on non-Federal projects financed by P. W. A., 33 percent.

Agriculture is doomed as an individualistic competitive enterprise, but the administration is apparently trying to maintain this system, and the acquisitive instinct, instead of fostering intelligent socialized farming, whether Government farms, or cooperative or corporation farms, under strict Government control.

The subsistence homesteads and rural industrial communities the administration is trying to set up are also methods of lowering living standards of workers, and getting them away from crowded centers where their protest is dangerous.

Housing is the most practical method of large-scale reemployment of nonprofessional workers, but the present and proposed schemes of the administration can't work, because land speculators and owners of death-dealing tenements have blocked it, and the administration doesn't dare to alienate support by exercising its powers of eminent domain and taxation of land values. States are also to blame for failing to transfer taxes from buildings to land values, which would be a major step toward settling the housing problem.

The Guffey bill reported by the Senate Subcommittee on Interstate Commerce would have the Government pay $300,000,000 for coal lands, this sum to be assessed on consumers, although the Department of the Interior recently reported that there are 200,000,000,000 tons of valuable coal on Government-owned land.

The coal and oil codes fortified the gamblers in these natural resources and are costing consumers at least $400,000,000 a year, in addition to the hundreds of millions of dollars that consumers pay in taxes on these commodities.

Few measures of the new deal end any special privilege; most of them fortify one or another. The bill to end ultimately (why not now?) holding companies for public utilities is a step in the right direction, but ignores the basic fact that the one proper holding company for public utilities is the Federal Government.

The securities law makes stock gambling a little safer, but doesn't stop it. The National Industrial Recovery Act fortified monopolies, solidified scores of billions of watered stock into profit earning, mulcted consumers, and crucified labor's standards.

The Agricultural Adjustment Act is primarily a bonanza for speculators in farm lands and holders of mortgages thereon.

Organized labor has lost pretty much along the line because its leaders have largely tried to divide the swag with the capitalists. There is no hope for labor, as it learned by the defeat of the prevailing rate of wages provision, in that course. If it is to hold the sympathy of the consuming public organized labor—and this is equally true of organized farmers—must abandon their role of subcapitalists.

There are two alternatives to early and pretty wild inflation, which is as hard to control as a cyclone and which can easily reduce the purchasing power of savings, dividends, interest, and life-insurance policies and annuities to one-third or even 1 percent.

Those alternatives are heavy Federal taxation of incomes, including income from Government bonds, estates, corporation profits, and liquid surpluses, and land values, and writing down capital structure, debt, and land values, before this Congress adjourns.

Unless we pay as we go in peace we won't in war.

Inflation does not lead to socialization, but to desperation, starvation, and militarization, as witness Germany.

We probably cannot maintain a decent standard of living for the masses of the American people, who probably will not peacefully accept any other standard and pay much, if any, over 2 per cent on capital structure of corporations on land values and on debt.

The terror of reactionary wealth over the mess in Washington and the mass discontent in the Nation is evidenced by the bills to prevent frank discussion and to abolish civil liberties, such as the McCormack and Dickstein bills, the increased appropriations for Army, Navy, and air forces, and the increase of one-third in the Army.

There can be no peace between nations till there is justice within nations and international cooperation. Secretary of State Hull is to be highly commended for his efforts for lower tariffs to increase international cooperation.

Write or wire your Member of the House and both your United States Senators to oppose all legislation until Congress—

1. Adopts the British system of taxation, which would yield about $4,000,000,000 additional revenue, repeal at least one and a half billion dollars of Federal consumption taxes, and enacts the Moritz bill taxing owners of valuable land. England taxes heavily in the depression—so can we.

2. Creates a Government housing corporation empowered to get land at a reasonable figure and to construct plants or to obtain material for housing at a reasonable price.

3. Creates a Government marketing corporation such as Senator FRAZIER'S bill sets up, so that farmers may produce to meet the Nation's needs instead of reduce to match the people's poverty.

4. Creates a Federal natural resources board to take over the four great competing natural resources—coal, oil, water power, and gas—paying owners for values they have created, so we may have electrical energy and heat at a nonmonopolistic price.

5. Creates an agency to write down excess capitalization, debts, and interest rates, as socialization at present prices would break us.

6. Creates a central Government bank to socialize credit for consumption, not to liberalize it for speculation, as the silver simpletons and speculators, land and stock gamblers, and other inflationists wish.

7. Creates an organization empowered to condemn good farm land and run farms itself or organize collective farms to employ tenant and dispossessed farmers and share-croppers.

PUBLIC SERVICE EDUCATION—ADDRESS BY HARRY G. VAVRA

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very interesting address on the subject of Public Service Education, delivered over the radio by Harry G. Vavra, national president of the Educational Conservation Society, on the occasion of American conservation week, Monday, April 1, 1935.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Friends of the radio audience, it is a very real pleasure to extend greetings to you on this first day of American Conservation Week, which is being observed with ceremonies appropriate to the occasion in schools throughout the country.

My talk comes to you at a time when the Nation is still feeling the effects of the last drought. It comes to you at a time when the country is facing another possible national disaster in the sandstorm, which has swept over many of our States. Soil and weather experts have already warned that the damage to crops will run into millions of dollars, and that there is serious danger of the West becoming a great American desert. Deforestation and unjustified drainage practices are largely responsible. There is no doubt that lack of forestry and replanting, overgrazing, and improper methods of cultivation resulting in erosion of the soil have helped to cause such national calamities as droughts, floods, and forest fires.

President Roosevelt in his message to the Educational Conservation Society has given his whole-hearted endorsement to American Conservation Week and has truly stated that, "All of our people do not yet fully understand the full significance of conservation as related to our economic existence, although there is a constantly growing realization of this relationship, and in the last few years the cause of conservation has been advanced notably."

The American conservation week committee of the society consisting of the various State conservation agencies, is stressing the importance of teaching conservation as a regular subject in the schools of America so that present and future generations will be fully educated to its significance and principles.

In the year 1933 the Educational Conservation Society made a radio appeal for public conservation education over this network. Since that time much progress has been made. Secretary of the Interior Harold L. Ickes, many State Governors, the Federal Office of Education, State departments of education, State departments of conservation, college heads, and superintendents of schools all have endorsed the movement.

For many years conservation has been treated in a haphazard manner and in a piecemeal fashion as part of various subjects. After the pupils completed their elementary and high-school work, they really had no definite knowledge of its basic principles and problems. Educators soon found that this did injustice to the subject of conservation.

In a letter under date of August 23, 1934, State Superintendent L. A. Woods, of the Texas State Department of Education, wrote: "Permit me to say that I believe in the teaching of conservation from every angle—conservation of the forests, conservation of the natural resources, conservation of the waters that flow down the rivers of the several States, conservation of the soil, and conservation of the lives of the individuals of this Nation. Anything that you can do to develop this program more fully will be greatly appreciated by all. We are stressing conservation in the schools and out of the schools, but I doubt if we are getting very far. I am for you, and anything that may be done along this line."

It was in order to remedy this defect that the Educational Conservation Society originally launched a campaign for the teaching of conservation as a regularly required subject in the schools of America.

With the cooperation of State departments of education and State departments of public instruction, the Educational Conservation Society is preparing courses of study on the conservation of natural resources for the public elementary schools, high schools, colleges, and universities, and is preparing a program for the training of teachers, supervisors, and directors of conservation subjects. Several years have been devoted to this work, which will be completed in the near future.

The society is grateful to the radio and to the press that have cooperated in our campaign for public conservation education.

Due to lack of proper conservation education, the United States has suffered from such calamities as droughts, floods, and forest fires, resulting in serious loss of life and property. Due to inadequate conservation education, the Nation soon found itself faced with deforestation, soil exhaustion, destruction of mineral and water resources, as well as of scenic beauty and wildlife extermination.

Realizing the seriousness of the situation, the late President Theodore Roosevelt made conservation of the natural resources a definite national policy.

Fortunately for the social welfare of America, President Franklin Roosevelt is continuing and enlarging this policy of conserving the Nation's natural resources. The latest contribution is the report of the National Resources Board. This is the most comprehensive plan ever placed before the American people, and it certainly merits their whole-hearted support.

Fundamentally the basis of national prosperity and the happiness of present and future generations are dependent upon the conservation of the Nation's natural resources. Ultimately we obtain our food and clothing from the soil. Our forests not only conserve the soil but help to prevent floods and severe droughts. They provide us with various products and homes for wildlife. They have recreational and aesthetic values. Our waters are valuable for meeting domestic and community needs, for supplying power and irrigating arid lands, for providing homes for fish life and feeding places for waterfowl, for providing recreational and aesthetic opportunities, and for promoting navigation. Our subsoil resources, such as minerals, coal, peat, limestone, potash, saline deposits, chemical waters, oil, and gas, serve a variety of industrial and commercial purposes. They are a necessity to civilization. Our wildlife resources have great aesthetic and recreational as well as economic values. The beauty and health-giving influences of unspoiled nature are of serious concern to the public.

Natural resources are the heritage of present and future generations. It is your duty to protect them from unnecessary waste and destruction. Do cooperate with your Federal and State Governments by obeying their conservation laws. You can promote conservation and make America a more beautiful place to live in by working for constructive conservation laws, by preventing forest fires, and keeping the grounds clean, by taking part in the dedication of forests, parks, and sanctuaries, by planting trees, protecting the wild flowers, and feeding the birds.

It is more important to conserve our natural resources than to restore them after they are gone. That is often impossible. The people must be educated to the significance and principles of conservation. The school is the logical place to begin such a program. It is essential that the students be taught the principles of conservation. It is also essential that they be taught how to apply them practically. Good citizenship requires a definite knowledge of the subject.

The Educational Conservation Society is not only preparing conservation courses of study for the elementary schools and high schools but also for colleges and universities. It is making provision for the establishment of schools of conservation, departments of conservation, or departments of conservation education and summer nature conservation camps as parts of colleges and universities. The program includes such courses as will train prospective teachers of conservation and prepare students for positions with the Federal and State Governments.

As conservation is a State and national responsibility, it is only fair that Congress provide an annual appropriation for the purpose of cooperating with the States in the promotion of public conservation education by paying for the salaries and preparation of teachers, supervisors and directors of conservation subjects, equal sums to be contributed by the Nation and by the States for the purpose. The society is sponsoring a bill, S. 2384 introduced by Senator ROYAL S. COPELAND. The purposes of this bill are as follows: To provide for cooperation with the States in the promotion of conservation education in the public elementary schools, high schools, colleges, and universities; to provide for cooperation with the States in the preparation of teachers, supervisors, and directors of conservation subjects on the natural resources, and to appropriate money and regulate its expenditure.

The late Hon. Henry T. Rainey, Speaker of the House of Representatives, who fought for conservation from the administration of the late President Theodore Roosevelt until the present administration of President Franklin D. Roosevelt, made the following statement in a radio address delivered on April 8, 1934:

"I am thoroughly in sympathy with the efforts of the Educational Conservation Society. The place to commence a program of conservation is in the schools. Those who are to come after we are gone must be educated now as to the importance of the preservation of trees, of grass lands, of coal, of oil, and of wildlife. All of us who are now living can live out our lives perhaps without serious inconvenience but it is an obligation, which we must realize, to preserve natural resources for generations yet unborn."

Surely the people of the United States will agree with this view. It is altogether fitting and proper that American Conservation Week is being observed with ceremonies appropriate to the occasion in schools throughout the country.

ADDITIONAL HOME-MORTGAGE RELIEF

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6021) to provide additional home-mortgage relief, to amend the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, and the National Housing Act, and for other purposes.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD resolutions adopted by the United States Building and Loan League at its convention in New Orleans last October. I am asking that the resolutions be printed at the request of the executive vice president of the league, who is a resident of my State, and whose letter I also ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter and resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES BUILDING AND LOAN LEAGUE,
Chicago, Ill., April 11, 1935.

Hon. WILLIAM H. DIETERICH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR DIETERICH: Attached are seven resolutions which were adopted by our annual convention in New Orleans on October 26 of last year.

There were some fifteen hundred delegates from all over the United States at this convention. Our organization, as you know, includes some forty-one hundred building and loan associations and 46 State leagues. Over 75 percent of the assets in this type of cooperative thrift and home-financing institutions are included in our membership. These institutions have nearly 9,000,000 savings members and nearly 2,000,000 borrowing members.

These resolutions are constructive and have a general bearing on home-mortgage matters now before the Senate in the consideration of H. R. 6021. We would greatly appreciate it if you would present these resolutions for printing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at the time the Home Owners' Loan Corporation-Federal Home Loan Bank-Federal Housing Act bill is under consideration.

Your cooperation will be greatly appreciated.

Sincerely,

MORTON BODFISH,
Executive Vice President.

(Enclosure.)

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY UNITED STATES BUILDING AND LOAN LEAGUE

(At annual convention, New Orleans, La., Oct. 26, 1934)

TO PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT:

Whereas the President of the United States, Franklin D. Roosevelt, has sent to this Forty-second Annual Convention of the United States Building and Loan League a most gracious and cordial expression of his interest in the thrift and home-financing institutions of the country, and his recognition of the important part these institutions must play in the administration's announced objective to better the housing conditions of the country: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the United States Building and Loan League in convention assembled formally express their appreciation of this message and the interest and understanding shown therein, and that this resolution be certified and forwarded to the President of the United States.

MORATORIUM LEGISLATION CONDEMNED

Whereas legislation providing for either partial or entire repudiation of obligations cannot be constructive or sound; and

Whereas legislation providing for moratorium on the payment of obligations is taken advantage of by persons able to repay their obligations as well as by persons in distress and the building and loan associations wish to give every relief to worthy but distressed borrowers, but, at the same time, must conserve the savings of millions of persons whose funds have been loaned to and spent by persons now able and sometimes unwilling to pay: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the United States Building and Loan League in convention assembled formally protest the passage of moratorium legislation in many States, and those portions of the Frazier-Lemke Act which adversely affect the savings of millions of thrifty citizens of the United States and records its objection to further legislation of this nature.

FEDERAL HOME-LOAN BANKS

Whereas the President of the United States and the Federal Home Loan Bank Board have continued and sponsored the activities on behalf of the building and loan associations centered in the 12 Federal home-loan banks: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we express our appreciation for their interest and effort and sincerely recommend that the responsibilities of the Federal home-loan banks be increased and that they be made the operative units in the relationships of the savings, building, and loan associations with the several phases of Government affecting the thrift and home-financing facilities of the people; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be formally transmitted to the President of the United States and to the Federal Home Loan Bank Board.

H. O. L. C. APPLICATIONS

Whereas the Home Owners' Loan Corporation has received applications for loans totaling almost twice the available resources of the Corporation; and

Whereas many persons cannot but be eventually refused mortgages from the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, but in the meantime, pending a decision on their applications, are unwilling to continue payments of either interest or principal to present mortgage holders: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Board of Directors of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation is hereby formally requested to notify immediately those applicants for loans from the Corporation who cannot reasonably receive mortgages from the Corporation of this fact; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be formally transmitted to the Federal Home Loan Bank Board.

THE INSURANCE OF SHARES

Whereas Congress of the United States, as an integral part of the National Housing Act, provided for the insurance of investments in savings, building, and loan associations; and

Whereas it was the intention of Congress that all solvent honorably managed savings, building, and loan associations be accorded the privileges of this protection: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the United States Building and Loan League disapproves the spirit and detail of the Rules and Regulations promulgated for the Insurance Corporation as going beyond the necessities and intent of the statute enacted by Congress; and be it further

Resolved, That the most rigorous standards and supervision in the admission to and the conduct of the Insurance Corporation be approved; and be it further

Resolved, That we commend the statements of Mr. Fahey and Mr. Catlett made at the convention that there would be a minimum of regulation but a high standard of supervision; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be formally transmitted to the Federal Home Loan Bank Board.

ENDORSEMENT OF THE RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE ECONOMIC POLICY COMMITTEE

Whereas a part of the report of the economic policy committee of the United States Building and Loan League is as follows:

"LEGISLATION BY REGULATION

"Trustee savings institutions are more and more governed by public laws, and properly so. Your committee feels that careful, conscientious, and efficient supervision of building and loan associations is highly desirable. At the same time it is important for the economic stability of the Nation that supervision be consistent, well considered, and not dependent upon the whim of individuals whose positions may change from time to time. Your committee, therefore, deplores the tendency to establish supervision of trustee institutions by the method of sketching only the boundaries of that supervision in the statute law and conferring that statute almost unlimited powers upon administrators so that supervision becomes a matter of rule and regulation rather than of law. Your committee, therefore, urges that governmental activities affecting trustee institutions be more detailed as a part of the statute rather than made dependent upon the rule and regulation of individual administrators." Therefore be it

Resolved, That the United States Building and Loan League especially endorses this part of the report of the economic policy committee.

LOANS LIMITED TO COMMUNITIES HAVING SANITARY CODES

Resolved, That the imperative need is reemployment. Reemployment can be best brought about through the building industry. More than 4,000,000 insanitary and worthless houses are occupied by tenants. These insanitary houses are a constant source and breeder of disease and crime; landlords should not be permitted to rent out such premises. Under the police power, use of these premises can be prohibited. This would necessitate construction of 4,000,000 sanitary houses to replace these 4,000,000 worthless premises; such construction would employ the mechanics and artisans, would start the sawmills, brick kilns, nail factories, glass factories, and the threescore other industries that are necessary to the production of building materials, and would again employ the transportation lines and universal employment result therefrom: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we favor a rule to be adopted by the H. O. L. C. and the Housing Administration and the Housing Insurance Department that hereafter loans will only be made in communities protected by sanitary code prohibiting the use of such insanitary houses.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest that the Secretary state the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the committee amendment, at the end of section 8, on page 22, it is proposed to insert the following:

That section 4 (d) of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, as amended, be amended by adding: "Provided, That for the purposes of this act, levies of assessments upon real property, made by any special district organized in any State for public improvements, shall be treated as general-tax levies are treated, and the lien created by such improvement districts upon the real property within said district, to secure the payment of such improvement-district levies shall be considered as attaching to such real property at the time fixed by such improvement district for the payment of such levies and assessments and not before; and, for the purposes of this act, the lien of any mortgage placed upon any such real property by the owner thereof shall be considered a prior lien with reference to such improvement-district lien securing the payment of all said improvement-district assessments not due at the time the said owner executes such mortgage. The reasonableness of the total annual burden of taxes and assessments of all kinds upon any property offered as security for the payment of a loan made by the Corporation and the effect of such total levies upon the loanable value of such property are matters for the determination of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation Board, but no deduction shall be made from the loanable value of any property for improvement-district assessments or levies not due at the time of making such loan in any instance where the total annual taxes and assessments borne by the said property for all purposes does not exceed a sum which, in the discretion of the Board, is a reasonable annual tax burden for such property: Provided, That in arriving at the loanable value, in no instance shall any deductions be made on account of such improvement-district liens, taxes, and/or assessments not due at the time of making the loan where the aggregate amount of annual taxes, levies, and assessments of all kinds and for all purposes upon the property offered for security does not exceed a sum equal to 5 percent of the value of such property as fixed by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation appraisement."

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I should like the attention of the Senate while an explanation of this amendment is made.

Briefly, it proposes to amend provisions of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, as amended. It defines first liens on real estate where there are improvement-district taxes. It leaves the reasonableness of tax and assessment burdens to the Corporation Board and prevents deductions of improvement-district assessments not yet due from the loanable burden of the taxes if the annual tax burden, including such assessments, does not exceed 5 percent of the Corporation's appraisal of the property.

It is among the objects of the amendment to prevent discriminations in the making of loans against properties located in special-improvement districts.

In some of the States the cost of financing public improvements is added to the general taxes. Before concluding I shall submit for the RECORD a statement relating to this feature of the subject.

In other States, particularly in my own State, such costs are charged against the property in the various districts. The Home Owners' Loan Corporation, under the act and the regulations promulgated, does not take notice of the general taxes not yet due, even though the costs of improvements have been added thereto. The practice has been to deduct the total assessments for benefits, where there are districts for improvements, from the loanable value of the property, with the result, in my opinion, that in many applications for loans it is impossible to effectuate the purposes of the act. It should be remembered that in the cases I have in mind the deduction is not for the amount actually to be paid by the home owner, but it is for the total assessment of benefits not yet due. These assessments for benefits in many cases—and, I think it may be said, usually—greatly exceed the actual payments which are to be made. This constitutes a discrimination.

If an appraisal, for instance, amounts to $3,000 and the total assessed benefits aggregate $2,400, the loanable value generally is fixed at $2,400, and from this must be deducted all the assessments for benefits not yet due. In many cases the benefits were assessed at three times the costs of the improvements. In other words, the total payments through the years will amount to only about one-third of the assessments for benefits.

The practice of making the assessment for benefits high was to show increased value of the bonds and to make them more available. The bondholders would appear to have more security and better bonds. The home owner, in the case I have cited, is required, for instance, to pay $800 to retire the debt and release the lien. He may have paid half that amount, or $400, at the time he applies for the loan. At this time, and under present regulations, the corporation deducts $2,000 from the loanable value of $2,400 and offers to lend the very small amount of $400. From that amount deductions must be made for repairs. This puts the special-improvement districts or the property within them in an impossible or impracticable situation as compared with the States and localities in which the costs of special improvements are added to the general tax, no deduction being made for general taxes under the practice which prevails.

Early in the present year I introduced a bill identical, I believe, in terms with the pending amendment and had it referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. The Board recognized the necessity for some change either in the law or in the regulation and indicated then—I think it was February 14—the purpose of adopting new regulations respecting the subject. However, nothing in that behalf was done until an amendment was presented to the pending bill and under consideration. On the day before the testimony on behalf of the Board was submitted to the subcommittee, of which the able Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] is chairman, it was announced that an amendment to the regulations had been adopted which it was thought by the Board would overcome the difficulty with which my amendment deals. That regulation provides that where the property in question is located in a road improvement district and the outstanding improvement bonds of such district have been or will be refunded or underwritten by the State of Arkansas, then the above requirements, meaning the requirements as to total benefits assessed against the property for the improvements, shall not apply with respect to the deduction of road improvement assessments in such a district.

There is a second paragraph in the regulation as follows:

> Where the property is located in other improvement district or districts, the amount to be deducted from the loanable value of the particular property shall not be required to be for the whole of said improvement assessment, but only for the balance which would be due on the particular property if the assessment had been made on the basis of a proper proportion of the total bond issue instead of the amount of the total assessment.

The regulation was adopted by the Board just the day before the matter was presented by the able attorney for the Board to the subcommittee having jurisdiction of the bill now before us. The object, of course, was to avoid the incorporation of the amendment which I had presented. The regulation does relieve to some extent the difficulty, but it does not go far enough in the view of those who are most familiar with the situation with which we are dealing.

If it is necessary to make clearer the way in which the matter has been handled, let me state that it has been the construction of the act of 1933 that these assessments, whatever their amounts, constitute first liens on the property, and that it is necessary to deduct their total amount in order to make sure that the lien shall be discharged. The assessments extend over a long period of years. In every case that is true. As already stated, it is apparent that the assessments are frequently many times the amount of the tax which is expected to be paid.

In the States where the levies for special improvements are added to the general taxes, no deductions whatever are made either for the general tax or for the special improvement tax which is embraced in the general tax, whatever it may be, and in most of the States, as shown by the record which I shall present, the actual taxes to be paid where the loans are made are very much higher than in the State of Arkansas.

The State administrator has taken the view that the law requires the deduction of the total assessments for benefits. I have shown, I believe, by the illustration I gave—and it is easily demonstrable from the record—that the effect of the holding has been to prevent loans in many cases where they should and could be made without great risk, because the assessments for benefits are very high and frequently amount to almost as much as the appraised value of the property, so that the owner is unable to obtain a loan.

In a letter which the chairman of the Board, Mr. Fahey, wrote to the Committee on Banking and Currency respecting the bill which was referred to a few moments ago in my remarks, which is substantially the same as if not identical with the pending amendment, an illustration was given, which, in the opinion of those who are most familiar with this subject and in my opinion, is not a fair illustration. It appears to be overdrawn and misleading. In my judgment, no practical appraiser would fix a value of $8,000 on a $2,000 house with total assessed benefits of $4,000, as the letter referred to contemplated.

The object of this amendment is not to require the Board or the Corporation to accept loans involving great risk, but it is to permit and to enable them to make loans which are sound and adequately secured; and this it is doubtful whether they can do without the amendment to the statute which is proposed.

The question arises first as to whether the Board has the power to adopt and enforce the regulation which it promulgated the day before this question arose in the subcommittee having charge of the bill. The previous construction seems to have been that the Board did not have that power. At least the State administrator—acting, I concede, in entire good faith, and in the belief that he was carrying out the law—held that he was required by the statute to deduct, or to see that there is deducted, the entire amount of the assessed benefits, even though the greater portion of them is never to be paid, and even though none of those benefits is due. If this amendment shall be agreed to, it will afford an opportunity to have the matter fully considered. It will afford an opportunity further to take advice on the question as to whether the regulation to which I have several times referred in my remarks is within the authority of existing law.

Mark you, I do not take the position that the regulation is without authority. I am inclined to the belief that the Board has the power to make the regulation; but what I do not understand is that throughout the period which has elapsed since the passage of the act no such regulation has been made, although it is well known that many loans have not been granted for the simple reason that to deduct from the loanable value of the property offered as security the full amount of the assessed benefits not due—benefits the greater portion of which will never be paid—reduces the loanable value to so small an amount that the holder of existing securities refuses to accept that amount, forecloses his loan, and the home owner is turned out of his property. This has happened in numerous cases, and, in my judgment, it will continue to happen in the future even though the regulation mentioned should be sustained and carried out.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. I am not conversant with the amendment. It seems to be very comprehensive in nature. I am curious to know whether the Senator presented this matter to the Banking and Currency Committee when it was studying the bill now before the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. The matter was presented to the committee. A brief was filed there. It was thought by some that the regulation I have read, and which was adopted by the Board just the day before the subject came up in the committee, would cure the difficulty. I do not think it does so. I admit that it would be helpful if the regulation is within the law; but, as I see it, first, it is desirable to make clear that the statute does not forbid the Board to deal with the subject in any proper way that it chooses to do so; and, second, that it relieves the problem from the difficulty which prevents the making of loans in numerous cases where they are justified because of the deductions from the loanable value which frequently almost equals the value of the property.

Mr. McNARY. Did the committee, while studying the measure which is now the unfinished business, consider the proposal which the Senator is now advocating; and if so, what action did it take?

Mr. ROBINSON. The committee did not incorporate the amendment in the bill. I think the committee would be content to have the amendment included in the bill, with a view to making such further study of the subject as occasion requires and permits.

Mr. McNARY. Is the Senator presenting this proposal at the suggestion of the Home Loan Board?

Mr. ROBINSON. No; I do not present it as a suggestion of the Home Loan Board. For 2 years, as I have tried to make plain, this matter has been taken up with the Home Loan Board from time to time, and it is my understanding that they are in sympathy with a reform on the subject, but at first there was the thought, and probably that thought is entertained now by some, that under the existing statute it is doubtful whether it can be done; but, now that the regulation has been adopted, I have raised the question first as to the power to adopt the regulation, and second as to its adequacy. I do not think it goes far enough, and I am therefore asking that the amendment be incorporated in the bill and considered by the conferees.

I ask to have printed in the RECORD a brief on this subject which discusses it somewhat fully, which contains the memorandum of figures taken from the report of the Detroit Bureau of Governmental Research. This report shows, for instance, that in Cambridge, Mass., where there is a population of 125,800, the city tax is 23.20 mills on the basis of the assessment that is required by their law. In comparison with that, in Little Rock, Ark., where there is a population of about 80,000, the city tax proper is 7.42 mills, or about one-third of the amount of the city tax in Cambridge; and the city tax per thousand in Little Rock is $3.71, whereas in Cambridge the city tax is $23.20. These figures are cited to show that in many cases where the special-improvement tax is added to the general tax the net result is a higher levy than exists in the State of Arkansas. I believe the amendment is amply safeguarded.

Let me say, too, in this connection that it is realized that in the enforcement of the act and of the amendment, liberal authority must be granted to the Board. There is no effort to take away from the Board the right to determine when the general tax is so great that there must be a deduction from the amount of the loanable value; but it is insisted that inasmuch as the general tax, including special-improvement taxes, is not deducted from the loanable value, the special assessment should not be deducted from the loanable value unless it appears to the Board that the amount of taxes on the property is so great as to reduce the value of the security.

In some cases relating to these improvement districts the taxes do not mature for many years. In numerous cases the period of maturity is 20 years; and yet the whole amount of the assessment—mark you, not the amount of the tax, for that is the proposition in the second paragraph of the regulation recently adopted by the Board, but the whole amount of the assessment for benefits—is deducted from the loanable value; and I have several times stated that that prevents the making of loans in cases where the loans are perfectly good and well secured.

I am entirely content to submit the matter. I trust that the chairman of the subcommittee having charge of the bill will see fit to let it go to conference.

Mr. BACHMAN and Mr. BULKLEY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield first to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BACHMAN. Mr. President, assuming that the Board has the authority to enforce the regulation, it would not reach the difficulties that exist in the equalization of the different sections, would it?

Mr. ROBINSON. No; they would reach them only to a partial degree. They recognize, in this regulation, the injustice——

Mr. BACHMAN. And the inequality.

Mr. ROBINSON. And the inequality that results from deducting the entire amount of the assessments for benefits; but they propose in this regulation to deduct the entire amount of tax, even though it may not be due, even though no portion of it may be due; and therein lies the discrimination which I have mentioned.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I desire to inquire of the Senator about the language commencing in line 4, page 2. It reads:

> The lien of any mortgage placed upon any such real property by the owner thereof shall be considered a prior lien with reference to such improvement-district lien securing the payment of all said improvement-district assessments not due at the time the said owner executes such mortgage.

I would like to make sure about the meaning of that. Am I to understand that if an assessment has been placed against the property, with the payments due over a series of years, and subsequent to that assessment a mortgage is given to the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, this language would presume to give the Home Owners' Loan Corporation a prior lien as against those assessments?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly, and it is perfectly fair to do that for this reason. We know that all property upon which loans are taken by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation is subject to general taxes. The lien as to a general tax does not attach until the tax becomes due. This simply provides that so long as there is no special improvement tax due on the property, there is no lien. The lien of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation is prior to a lien which may be fixed 10 years hence by reason of a special improvement tax becoming due and being unpaid. It is for the protection of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation.

Mr. BULKLEY. If an assessment had been made against property and a mortgage then given to the Home Owners'

Loan Corporation, and if we assume that the Home Owners' Loan Corporation were obliged to foreclose the mortgage before all the payments of the assessment were due, does the Senator think the property could be sold clear of the assessments and without the obligation of the assessments?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, that is a difficult question. The sale of the property would be subject to any lien which existed upon it, of course.

Mr. BULKLEY. Then, in effect, the Home Owners' Loan Corporation does not get a first lien ahead of the assessments.

Mr. ROBINSON. That depends on the statutes. I see the force of the Senator's suggestion. I think it is within the power of the Congress to say that improvement district taxes not yet due shall be governed by the same rule as that with respect to general taxes. When a loan is taken on property by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, it may be known that within a month or two the taxes for the next year will become due, but the lien of the Corporation is, in law, prior to the lien for the taxes, because the lien for the taxes has not yet attached. The proposed legislation is believed to be within the power of the Congress, but I concede that the language may be improved.

Mr. BULKLEY. Of course, it is perfectly competent for the Congress to direct the Home Owners' Loan Corporation to value property on the assumption that they have a first lien, but unless the Senator goes so far as to say that on foreclosure the property can be sold free of those liens, it is absolutely of no effect to say that the Home Owners' Loan Corporation has a first lien.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; the Senator is correct. That brings us back to a consideration of the original proposition, that the whole of the assessments are deducted from the loanable value of the property, even though they may never be paid, even though they may never become due. That is not done with respect to general taxes. I hope the Senator will consent to the incorporation of the amendment.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. FRAZIER. I wish to ask the Senator whether he is familiar with the regulation in the matter of loans on real estate by the land banks, how the special tax question is handled in such cases.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; and I have introduced a bill on that subject. I think a very similar process to that employed by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation is followed by the land banks, but the result is that those who most need loans are unable to get them even though the loans may be perfectly good.

Mr. FRAZIER. I think that is exactly the case.

Mr. ROBINSON. That question, however, is not involved in this matter.

Mr. FRAZIER. I understand that.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. To what extent would the property which is eligible for loans under the Home Owners' Loan Corporation Act, that is, dwelling houses in cities and towns, be affected by these improvement districts, which primarily are organized for the purpose of improving rural property?

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator has a misconception. Many improvement districts are exclusively within cities and towns. They are organized for the purpose of carrying out various improvements, which are presumed to add to the value of the property.

Mr. BARKLEY. Such as sewers.

Mr. ROBINSON. Sewers, paving, streets, sidewalks, and many other public works.

Mr. BARKLEY. They do not relate, then, to drainage districts at all in any respect?

Mr. ROBINSON. Drainage districts usually do not exist in cities and towns. There may be conceivable cases where there ought to be some.

Mr. BARKLEY. Property in villages which would be eligible for loans under the Home Owners' Loan Corporation Act might be affected.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes. Of course, the amendment relates to all special improvement district taxes. A distinction is made, however, in certain improvement districts, as I read in the regulation referred to a few moments ago.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. COUZENS. Would the amendment put the Home Owners' Loan Corporation in a less favorable position than that occupied by a private lender?

Mr. ROBINSON. No; it would not.

Mr. COUZENS. Would the private lender have the same restrictions imposed on him that are proposed in the amendment to be imposed on the Home Owners' Loan Corporation?

Mr. ROBINSON. As I understand, restrictions cannot be imposed by act of Congress on private lending. Private lenders can determine their own terms and conditions. So far as I am advised, I do not know of any way in which a strictly private loan can be limited by action of the Congress.

Mr. BULKLEY. If the private lender may fix his own appraisal, and we restrict the Home Owners' Loan Corporation as to what they may do in appraising, then obviously they are worse off than the private lender.

Mr. ROBINSON. Of course, State laws may restrict private lenders, but I apprehend that the object of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation is not to deny to private lenders the right to make loans, if they wish to do so, but the operations of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation are for the purpose of supplying funds for home owners in distress on terms and conditions which are reasonably sound and safe.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. The amendment is somewhat complicated and not easily understood.

Mr. ROBINSON. I thought that at first of the regulation which the Board has adopted; but, when I studied it, I saw that it was easily understood, and I think the amendment is not difficult to understand.

Mr. BARKLEY. It was not discussed, as I recall it, in the subcommittee or in the full committee and was not given any consideration, although it was offered.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is true.

Mr. BARKLEY. So that, so far as I am concerned, it is an entirely new proposal. I find difficulty in clearing up in my own mind whether the Home Owners' Loan Corporation really would have a first lien on the property. Let us take, for instance, a street improvement, where under the laws of the State the legal subdivision has a lien against the property for the cost of the improvement, just as in the case of other taxes, and the property may be sold under certain circumstances. If that lien attached to the property prior to the making of a loan or the recording of a mortgage which is to be the subject of refinancing under the Home Owners' Loan Corporation Act, what effect would the Senator's amendment have upon the subsequent transactions by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation in refinancing the private loan which a building and loan association or any other lending agency might make?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the lien does not attach in a legal sense until there arises some default. In other words, it is perfectly competent for the Senate and for the Congress to treat special improvement taxes just as they treat general taxes. Of course, when general taxes mature and are unpaid, a lien attaches, but it is subject to prior existing liens. What is actually occurring now is to discriminate against the owners of property within improvement districts by making them pay assessments for benefits the larger part of which they will never have to pay, and by making them pay taxes which are not yet due and concerning which there may never be anything due.

Mr. BULKLEY. The potential lien attaches just the same, just as it is always possible that a man will not pay his annual taxes, and if he is in default, there is a lien which the law creates on the property.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; but in making these loans, no account is taken of the annual taxes. It may be said that we take that chance; that the owner may not pay his taxes; and that is true. But the reasonable amount likely to be required to be paid in the years during which the loan will run is not ascertained and deducted. In those States where the cost of the improvement is added to the general tax, nothing is deducted. The owners of property are given the full benefit of the appraised value.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. What is the effect of the provision in the Senator's amendment as to the 5-percent limitation?

Mr. ROBINSON. The effect of that is to fix an arbitrary rule for the guidance of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation Board in determining when the general burden of taxes is too high. The proposed amendment goes a long way toward recognizing the fact that taxes may be so great, adding general to special improvement taxes, that the Board is obliged to take that fact into consideration, and the rule which is fixed for its guidance is that where the total amount of the tax does not exceed 5 percent it shall not make a deduction.

After all, it is within the discretion of the Board, and the object of that provision is to assist the Board. It is true that some information will be required which ordinarily would not be required, but the borrower can be required by the Board to furnish a certificate showing, for instance, that the total amount of the taxes which will mature will not exceed 5 percent, in which event the Board would make no deduction. If it appeared that the general and special tax aggregated more than that, the Board would make a deduction.

I submit the amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. Ordinarily where a mortgage is made and the mortgagor does not pay his tax, the mortgagee has the right to pay the tax and add it to his principal.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. And I assume that would obtain under the provision proposed by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; it would obtain.

Mr. FLETCHER. Suppose the district tax should be defaulted.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then the situation would be the same as in the case of the general tax. If the Home Owners' Loan Corporation should make a loan in Cambridge, Mass., where the general tax rate is 23.20 mills per dollar and there is a default in the payment of tax, in order to protect its security the Corporation would have to pay the tax, just as it would in Little Rock, where the general tax is only 7.42 mills, or in the Massachusetts case which I cited—and I do not cite this in criticism of Cambridge, of course—in the Cambridge case the city tax on the thousand would be $23.20, whereas in Little Rock the city tax would be $3.71. Of course, if the property in Little Rock were located in an improvement district, that improvement tax would have to be added to the $3.71, but in the Cambridge case, as I understand it, all taxes are comprehended in the figure of $23.20 per thousand.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to ask the Senator what effect his amendment would have on the plan we follow in Kentucky, which, perhaps, is followed in some other State. Street-improvement taxes, for instance, are levied on the 10-year plan. The tax is due when the council or the board, or whatever the city authority may be, accepts the work; but the taxpayer does not have to pay the tax except within a 10-year period in installments.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is my understanding that in such case, where the tax is not due, the deduction would not be made. If the tax is due, it would have to be made.

Mr. LOGAN. Suppose the State has a law providing that the lien shall attach when the work is accepted. Would the Senator's amendment conflict with the State law on that subject, and does the Senator think this amendment, if enacted, would be controlling?

Mr. ROBINSON. I think the Board would have the authority under this amendment to make deductions for the tax which is due.

Mr. LOGAN. The purpose of the latter part of the amendment is to enable the Board to take that matter into consideration?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

Mr. LOGAN. And it would do no one any harm?

Mr. ROBINSON. No; it would do no one any harm. Of course, as a general proposition, we would have to have in mind that a good loan was being made. We would have to have in mind that we were not taking any undue risk in making the loan.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. As to improvement assessments mentioned by my colleague, which are payable in 10 years, usually on an annual installment basis, of course, the Board could deduct any installment due and unpaid at the time the loan is made.

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. But after that, so long as the loan continues, in the next year after the loan is made and the rights of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation attach, what would be the result if any unpaid installment were defaulted and not paid at all by the owner?

Mr. ROBINSON. As a practical proposition, the Home Owners' Loan Corporation would probably pay as it would general taxes.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIETERICH. I should like to ask the views of the Senator from Arkansas on the situation I shall state.

A special assessment is levied against a property for local improvements. Of course, that assessment is levied on the theory that the local improvement increases the value of the property. The amount of the levy is assessed, but the payments are postponed under the installment plan. In the meantime, a loan is procured from the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. Default is made on that loan, and a foreclosure takes place before the special assessments are due. Does the Senator maintain that the purchaser of the property at the foreclosure sale acquires title which is not subject to the lien of the special assessment?

Mr. ROBINSON. I think if subsequently to his acquisition of title an assessment became due and was unpaid, he probably would have to meet it.

Mr. DIETERICH. But the Senator says in his amendment "due and unpaid." Those are two things. I refer to an assessment which is spread over a period of years. Of course, payment of the assessment is postponed by the installment process.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes. In the State of Arkansas, for instance, there is a statute which provides that the grantee shall assume the payment of improvement-district taxes which are not due. If there are any taxes which are due at the time of the grant the seller would be compelled to pay them. But taxes which become due afterward I think would be paid by the grantee.

Mr. DIETERICH. Will the Senator from Arkansas further yield to me?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. DIETERICH. The situation in Illinois is that perhaps in every city of any importance where paving or construction of sewers is needed, such construction is provided by special assessments. Payment of those assessments is postponed by the installment method, and bonds are issued against the installments. Our law makes such assessments a special lien on the property, and the purchaser of the bonds takes them with the understanding that the law does give him a special lien by reason of the fact that the improvement has injected a value which was not there before. Will the effect of the Senator's amendment be to take away the property rights of the holder of the bonds?

Mr. ROBINSON. No, Mr. President. As I have just stated, the grantee in that case probably would be compelled to pay the tax; not the assessment, but the tax. There is a distinction between the assessment for benefits, and the tax. I have already pointed that out.

Mr. DIETERICH. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. DIETERICH. My concern is that probably every bank in the State of Illinois is carrying bonds of the improvement district within its town or city. Of course, I should not want to do anything which would impair their obligations.

Mr. ROBINSON. No. I do not think this amendment would impair any obligation.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. POPE. Referring to line 6, on page 2, where the language "prior lien" is used, does that mean that liens of all special-assessment districts, drainage districts, irrigation districts, and the like, would be subject to the lien of the mortgage, and in case of foreclosure the lienors would be joined as parties defendants and their rights cut off as being subject to the prior mortgage? Is that not the meaning of a prior lien?

Mr. ROBINSON. A prior lien, of course, gives precedence or priority to the lien referred to.

Mr. POPE. Yes; and in the case of a foreclosure, all subsequent lienors who are made proper parties defendant would be foreclosed.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; I do not think they would be foreclosed. Unless the improvement tax is due there could be no foreclosure. I think the effect would be to give the Home Owners' Loan Corporation a first lien in cases where there is no tax due.

Mr. POPE. What does "first lien" mean? Does it not mean that it is prior to and would cut off all subsequent liens in the event of foreclosure?

Mr. ROBINSON. No; I do not think it cuts off anyone's lien, but where there is nothing due, nothing matured, it would give the Corporation the right to make a loan, to hold a first lien on the property. I am entirely content that the amendment shall go to conference for such consideration as the conferees may believe it merits.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before the Senator from Ohio takes the floor, the Chair asks the Senator from Arkansas whether he desires to have the brief and letter to which he referred included in his speech.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes, Mr. President; I wish to have the brief, the table of figures taken from the report of the Detroit Bureau of Governmental Research respecting taxes, and also the letter from Mr. Fahey which I have mentioned incorporated in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the brief, table, and letter will be printed in the RECORD, as requested.

The matter referred to is as follows:

BRIEF IN SUPPORT OF S. 1165, BY MR. ROBINSON

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: With your permission, the following brief in support of S. 1165, by Mr. ROBINSON, is respectfully submitted for consideration by your committee.

S. 1165 is entitled "A bill to prevent discrimination against certain distressed home owners on account of the different methods that have been employed in the various States for financing public improvements, to avoid penalizing worthy properties in special-improvement districts, and for other purposes."

Stated briefly, it amends section 4 (d) of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, as amended. It defines, for purposes of the act, first liens on real estate where there are improvement-district assessments. It leaves the reasonableness of tax and assessment burdens to Home Owners' Loan Corporation Board, and prevents deduction of improvement-district assessments not yet due from the loanable value of the property if the entire annual tax burden, including such assessments, does not exceed 5 percent of the Corporation's appraisal of the property. It prevents discrimination against properties in special-improvement districts.

Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, as amended, proposes to prevent differences in treatment, and expressly provides that no home mortgage shall be discriminated against by reason of its being in a taxing district which is in default. However, there are other discriminations that are not provided for. The purpose of S. 1165 is to take care of a most serious one.

Some States add the cost of financing public improvements to the general tax; others assess such cost against the property in a given improvement district. The Home Owners' Loan Corporation, under the act and the regulations promulgated by it, takes no notice of the general tax not yet due, although the cost of improvements has been added thereto; but it deducts the total assessment of benefits, where there are districts for improvements, from the loanable value of the property. The deduction is not for the amount actually to be paid by the home owner over a period of years but for the total assessment of benefits not yet due, which assessments may, and usually do, greatly exceed actual payments. Clearly, this constitutes a discrimination.

To emphasize the distinction, there is attached hereto as exhibit 1 a comparative statement showing the low property-tax rate in Little Rock, Ark., where the cost of public improvements is not included, and the much higher rates in other cities where the cost of such improvements is added to the property tax. The Little Rock rate prevails in other Arkansas cities.

Hundreds of cases on meritorious applications could be presented to show a distressing situation under present procedure. We give a concrete example:

If an appraisal amounts to $3,000 and the total assessed benefits amount to $2,400, the Corporation fixes as loanable value of $2,400, from which must now be deducted all assessments of benefits not yet due. In many instances the benefits were assessed at three times the cost of improvements. In other words, the total payments through the years will amount only to about one-third of the total assessment of benefits. This practice of the past in making such assessments high was to show a greater value behind the bonds and make them more salable. The bondholders would appear to have more security and better bonds. The home owner is required to pay only $800 to retire the debt and release the lien. He may have paid half the amount, or $400, at the time he applied for the loan. At this time and under present regulations the Corporation deducts $2,000 from the loanable value of $2,400 and offers to lend only $400, from which must also be deducted repairs, and so forth. The mortgagee, with an indebtedness of $1,000, knowing his security is good, refuses to scale his debt to the ridiculously low amount and accept less than $400 for it. He forecloses and the owner loses his home. Although home owner must pay improvement district assessments amounting only to $400 over a period of years, and not exceeding $40 or $50 annually, the Corporation has deducted $2,000 from his loanable value on that account.

The above illustration is not an isolated case. It is the general situation. With long-term bonds and with assessments of benefits trebled in many cases over costs of improvement, one may readily see the situation when assessments of benefits not yet due are deducted from the loanable value.

We carry the above illustration further. The general property tax in Arkansas averages about 40 mills on the dollar of assessed valuation. The property assessment for taxation does not exceed 30 percent of the actual value. The property tax on a $3,000 home would be about $36 annually. If S. 1165 is enacted into law no deductions would be made from the loanable value unless taxes annually paid in improvement districts amount to more than $114. In other words, the owner could have an annual tax liability of $150 without any deductions being made from his loanable value on that account. If more than that amount, deductions would be made, because the tax burden would be too heavy. This procedure would put States with special improvement districts more nearly on a parity with States that add the cost of public improvements to the general tax.

It will be readily seen that the matter needs immediate and special attention by referring to the letter of Chairman Fahey, of Home Owners' Loan Corporation, dated February 14, 1935, and addressed to your chairman. Mr. Fahey was writing about S. 1165, and a copy of his letter is hereto attached as exhibit 2. The following extracts are taken from it:

"In our opinion, this may properly be reached by the Corporation by regulation * * * this matter will be given further special attention. * * * As stated above, we believe we can handle this situation by regulations. * * *"

Chairman Fahey undoubtedly recognized the seriousness of the situation and proposed to correct it by regulations. Although he expressed a belief on February 14, 1935, that he could do so, it undoubtedly has occurred that perhaps a rule to take care of the situation will conflict with the Home Owners' Loan Act. That presumption undoubtedly is correct, for no regulations have yet been published. Long before S. 1165 was introduced by Senator ROBINSON, relief by regulations had been frequently promised. The serious conditions remains unchanged 6 weeks after Mr. Fahey wrote to you, and makes imperative the passage of this bill to prevent penalizing worthy properties.

As evidence of how the matter is handled in this State to the disadvantage of the home owner, and as conclusive proof that it has not been cared for by regulation as promised we quote from a letter written by Mr. R. F. Milwee, State manager of Home Owners' Loan Corporation for Arkansas, under date of March 13, 1935, as follows:

"The Home Owners' Loan Act requires that loans of the Corporation be secured by first liens upon the properties offered. As pledges of the benefits in improvement districts create liens upon the properties in the district, therefore, in all cases where the homes of owners who are applying for loans through this Corporation are located within such improvement districts, all unpaid amounts of pledges of assessed benefits will, as a matter of course, be deducted from the loanable value of the property."

The letter of Mr. Milwee was written a month after Mr. Fahey wrote, and is attached as exhibit 3.

Two of the exhibits (nos. 2 and 3) show a clear-cut issue. Mr. Fahey's letter is a theoretical suggestion of how the situation may be corrected at some future date through regulations. Mr. Milwee, as the supreme authority of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation in Arkansas, says the act prevents relief and that the Corporation will continue to deduct assessments of benefits from the loanable value.

The Arkansas agency has many worthy loans which cannot be closed on account of the legal inhibition. If, as Mr. Fahey says, it is a matter of regulation only, then the distressed home owners in Arkansas have been terribly abused during the past 20 months, because no regulations to remedy the situation have been promulgated, although the matter has been repeatedly called to the attention of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation.

The illustration given by Chairman Fahey in his letter to you is not only overdrawn but is very misleading. No practical appraiser would fix a value of $8,000 on a $2,000 house with total assessed benefits of $4,000 against it. Regardless of formula, he would put what he considered an actual value on it, including improvement district assessments that add to or take from the value. It is his natural course of conduct through years of training and experience before Home Owners' Loan Corporation was even conceived. He can be instructed to add assessed benefits to the value, and may do so for a brief time. But his mental attitude acquired in such matters through the years will cause him to lapse into his accustomed way and deduct everything that would tend to decrease value. He cannot help it. This attitude of the appraiser is based on a custom in Arkansas for a long period of years, backed up by the statutes of the State, which provide that taxes and assessments of any improvement district of any kind shall run with the land and be assumed by the grantee (sec. 1495, Crawford & Moses' Digest of the Statutes of Arkansas).

The appraiser fixes the actual value and takes into consideration the heavy assessments, since he sees and makes inquiry about the improvements. He may decide the property is practically worthless because of the heavy assessments. His appraisal is filed. The total assessments are again deducted. Such action destroys the purpose of the act in many cases; is wholly unfair and disastrous.

But conceding Mr. Fahey's illustration, which, at least, is most unusual, the Corporation, under the Robinson bill, could, and probably would, find that the annual payments on assessed benefits plus the general property tax exceed 5 percent of the appraised value and make necessary deductions.

There is no difference in practical application between general property taxes and annual payments on special assessments. There should be no difference so far as the Corporation is concerned. The object of the Corporation is to save homes and in doing so to secure a valid lien on the property that may not be jeopardized through heavy tax loading.

The largest and most prudent money lenders in the United States, including many nationally known life-insurance companies, have made loans in this State without deducting improvement district assessments not yet due. They consider the loans good, and refuse to accept scales of indebtedness made necessary by application of Home Owners' Loan Act and regulations. They choose as a business proposition to foreclose.

If the situation is so serious as to require "special attention", as Mr. Fahey said, and so important as to require handling "by regulations", but not so handled, the Congress should act.

Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, as amended, contains certain definitions and requirements as to title; principally that each home mortgage "shall be carried as a first lien"; that the term "real estate" as used in the act shall include only "real estate held in fee simple"; that "the term 'home mortgage' means a first mortgage on real estate in fee simple."

The Congress having already defined certain terms in the act, has the right and duty, without question, to extend or limit these and other definitions and provisions, if by so doing the purposes of the law will be made more effectual. It is the one body that can modify provisions of statutes. No regulations of the Corporation can change them. Even though the trouble could be reached by resolution, the Corporation has failed or refused to take such action. The Congress can and should further define terms of the acts to eliminate possible discriminations without affecting the Corporation's lien.

S. 1165, by Mr. ROBINSON, will solve a serious problem which has not been, and perhaps cannot be, reached by regulation.

We therefore earnestly urge its approval.

Respectfully,

LITTLE ROCK REAL ESTATE BOARD,
By A. L. WOOTEN,
Chairman Legislative Committee.

EXHIBIT 2

FEBRUARY 14, 1935.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Chairman Senate Committee on Banking and Currency,
301 Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I have your letter of January 19 and regret exceedingly the delay in answering it, which delay was due to the extreme pressure of work here.

S. 1771 is a bill which incorporated what this Board believes is proper for the full and proper function of this establishment and the instrumentalities for which this Board and its members are responsible.

S. 1165 would require Home Owners' Loan Corporation to treat special district assessments for public improvements the same as general tax levies and prohibit any specific deduction from the value of the property on account of such special assessments. In our opinion, this matter may properly be reached by the Corporation by regulation. It does not seem to us that legislation is necessary on this subject and this matter will be given further special attention.

I might point out that the enactment of this bill would make it necessary for the appraiser to know the amount of the special-assessment burden against an individual piece of property in order to arrive at a proper appraisal, and such procedure would arrive at substantially the same result as the course pursued by the Corporation where its regulations have been followed. It seems to the board of directors that it is necessary for special-assessment burdens to be considered either in the appraisal of the property or by a deduction from the appraisal if the property is appraised as improved as a result of such special-assessment levies. May I give one illustration of this question? We sometimes find a small house, costing $2,000 to build, on a block of suburban property around which the city has paved the streets on all sides, making total assessment of $4,000, which is outstanding and which must be paid by the owner. The property in its improved condition may be appraised for $8,000, and if one deducts the $4,000 assessment lien, which is a first lien, the loanable value is $4,000, 80 percent of which the Corporation may lend, or $3,200. If the same piece of property is appraised with consideration of the fact of an outstanding first lien for assessments which must be paid, it should properly be appraised at $4,000, and the Corporation could lend up to $3,200.

As stated above, we believe we can handle this situation by regulations and that legislation on this subject is unnecessary.

Very truly yours,

(Signed) JOHN H. FAHEY, Chairman.

EXHIBIT 3

(On letterhead of Home Owners' Loan Corporation)

ARKANSAS STATE OFFICE,
Little Rock, Ark., March 15, 1935.

Mr. A. L. WOOTEN,
Chairman Legislative Committee,
Little Rock Real Estate Association, Little Rock, Ark.

DEAR MR. WOOTEN: Replying to your inquiry as to what will be the future policy of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation with regard to liens on improvement districts, advise as follows:

The Home Owners' Loan Act requires that loans of the Corporation be secured by first liens upon the properties offered. As pledges of the benefits in improvement districts create liens upon the properties in the district, therefore, in all cases where the homes of owners who are applying for loans through this Corporation are located within such improvement districts, all unpaid amounts of pledges of assessed benefits will, as a matter of course, be deducted from the loanable value of the property.

We are informed that Senator ROBINSON has proposed to Congress an amendment to the Home Owners' Loan Act which, if enacted, would permit the Corporation to consider the pledges of the benefits in improvement districts as arising at the time fixed for the payment of annual assessments and not before. In other words, if the Corporation is permitted to consider the pledges of the benefits in improvement districts as falling due annually as in the case of other taxes, we would not be required to regard such assessments as first liens upon the properties in improvement districts and would not have to deduct same from the loanable value.

Trusting that the above answers the question raised by you, I am,

Yours very truly,

R. F. MILWEE, State Manager.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, the amendment submitted by the Senator from Arkansas was before the Home Owners' Loan subcommittee of the Committee on Banking and Currency. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], a valued member of the subcommittee, was diligent in his attendance at the meetings of the subcommittee, but, being also a member of the Committee on Finance, which has had important matters before it, he was not present at all the meetings of the subcommittee. Consequently, he has been misled into making a misstatement about the consideration this amendment received at the hands of the subcommittee. It was, in fact, considered and discussed. Witnesses from the Home Owners' Loan Corporation were questioned about it and its effect in the hearings of the subcommittee. After reasonably careful consideration, the subcommittee rejected the amendment, though it is fair to say that the engagements of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] were such that he was unable to come before the subcommittee himself and we did not have the advantage of discussing the matter with him.

The amendment was mentioned briefly but not fully discussed in the full committee, and was also rejected by the full committee.

However, the statement made by the Senator from Arkansas has persuaded me that there is a subject matter involved which is worthy of consideration, though I am frank also to say that he has not persuaded me that the amendment, in its present form, is proper or satisfactory. If it be possible to accept the amendment for the purpose of taking it to conference, and if, notwithstanding the recent discussion on this floor about the duties of conferees, it may be understood that the conferees on the part of the Senate are not to be bound to fight to the last ditch for the amendment, but only to see that it receives fair and honest consideration in conference, I, for one, shall be glad to consent to it, with that understanding.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think I ought to say in that connection that I shall be entirely content if the committee gives the amendment the consideration which it believes its importance requires.

Mr. BULKLEY. With that understanding, Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I am glad to accept it, but I should like to suggest to the Senator, on the advice of the legislative counsel, that it be inserted in a different place in the bill, namely, on page 24, after line 13.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I wish now formally to offer the amendment which has heretofore been submitted by me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Alabama to the amendment reported by the committee will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the amendment of the committee, at the proper place, it is proposed to insert the following, as a new section:

SEC. —. All work at regional offices, except supervising the making of loans, shall be, within 60 days after the approval of this act, transferred to and performed by the State organizations, and thereafter all work of collecting and servicing loans shall be done by the State organizations.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, originally I submitted an amendment to abolish the 11 regional offices of the organization. That amendment went to the subcommittee, which gave it fair consideration, having before it Mr. Fahey, who seems to have impressed the subcommittee with the idea, by reason of certain services now being performed by the regional offices in the matter, primarily, of coordinating the activities of the State organization and supervising in a general way the carrying out of the regulations of the Department in a uniform manner, that for those purposes the present organization is essential.

The subcommittee refused to adopt the amendment, and when the matter came before the full committee, in a spirit of compromise, I submitted the amendment which is now presented to the Senate. The matter was discussed at a meeting of the full committee, at which the majority in attendance were members of the subcommittee who had formerly dealt with the matter, a rather small number of the full committee being in attendance. However, at that meeting the matter was again discussed and the amendment rejected. I then gave notice that I would bring it to the floor of the Senate.

Mr. President, the Home Owners' Loan Organization in its headquarters in Washington placed, through its State organizations, the loans which were authorized and completed under the original authorization prior to the pending bill. Some time last summer, however, the organization set up regional offices in 11 places throughout the country. That was done at a time when the peak of the loan load had expired; it was done at a time only a few months before notice went out to the country that loans would be discontinued. It is still claimed, however, that in carrying out this new program the regional offices are necessary.

I have yielded to that idea to a limited extent, though not because I think it is justified. I do not think the regional offices ought ever to have been established; I do not think they are economical; I do not think that administration upon a pyramiding system of this sort is justified, and when decentralization was undertaken I think it should have gone further and the services now performed in the regional offices should have been transferred to the State offices which could, as I conceive it, render the services just as well as they are being rendered in the regional offices.

There were at the peak of the work about 2,900 employees in the headquarters in Washington. That number has been reduced to about 2,000; but we find, in place of the reduction of about 900 employees in the Washington headquarters, that 4,300 additional employees have been installed in the 11 regional offices of the country.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Did the Senator say 4,300 additional had been employed?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; the exact number being 4,347.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is in addition to the 2,000, not in addition to the 2,900 the Senator mentioned.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In addition to the 2,000. I said in lieu of the 900 displaced, 4,300 had been put into the regional offices. I am not complaining about the number; I do not know whether that number is required or not; that is not the point I am driving at; but I want to bring out here, as shown by Mr. Fahey in his testimony, the type and class and number of each type of these employees in the regional offices.

There are 120 executives in 11 regional offices, or about 10 executives to each regional office. There are 236 subexecutives and supervisors; 103 accountants and statisticians; 204 attorneys, an average of about 10 attorneys to each regional office; 1,152 stenographers and typists, an average of about 50 to each office; 2,387 clerks of various kinds.

The volume of the work may require that number; and I am not criticising in any way the number, but I am attempting to point out that with the great mass of these employees, and the kind of work they are performing in the regional offices the services could be just as efficiently performed in the State offices.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. Will the Senator tell us exactly what powers are exercised by the officials at the regional office?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I must confess, Mr. President, after listening patiently to Mr. Fahey, I was unable to get a very clear idea about the duties which are performed by these executives and supervisory officers, except I did ascertain when I got through that a number of them were engaged in the job of bossing a lot of the others.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do.

Mr. DUFFY. I understood that at the beginning of the operation of the regional offices the attempt was being made to make the collections and to service the various loans from an office usually located many hundreds of miles away from where the loans were made. I was wondering if the Senator knew if they were continuing that practice, and if he is not of the opinion that the experience of every business concern, such as large insurance companies, which have had to service such loans, indicates that it is very necessary to have the system decentralized, at least to such an extent that people may pay on their loans at the place where the loans were made?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I thank the Senator for his suggestion. I am coming to his question in a moment, because that is very largely the point involved in this amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do.

Mr. LOGAN. It is my understanding that the regional office does service the loans, and that it has a number of field men in each State who visit the borrower who may be in default. Such matters are looked after by field men in the different States and districts where the loans are made.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. When the regional manual was issued it provided that "under no circumstances are collectors, agents, or other employees of the corporation to accept checks, money orders, or any other form of payments, except duly authorized representatives in the regional offices." I understand this month there has been a change and the regional offices are not to continue exclusively the collection, but that collection is to be made by the officials and employees in the district offices instead of the regional offices. Because of that information I ask the Senator from Alabama if the duty of collecting the funds is transferred to the States and to the district offices, then what will be done by the regional officers?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Under the terms of the amendment I have offered the regional officers, after 60 days to give them time to reorganize, will have nothing to do with the collection or servicing of loans. If they have any duties to perform it will be in the matter of checking mortgages after loans shall have been closed.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to his colleague?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. With reference to the statement made that collections were supposed to be made by regional offices and the statement read by the Senator from South Carolina, that it was necessary that checks go to the regional offices, I have been informed by people in Alabama that it was impossible to ascertain where the checks should go; that there has been no effort made in many sections of the State to make collections at all; that the borrowers have been waiting for regional offices to function which apparently could not function. As a result there are hundreds in default not because they would have been in default if they had known where to pay, but because the regional offices, located hundreds of miles away, employed people who did not have anything to do and who did not seemingly have time to make collections.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It ought to be understood that these loans are all closed by the State offices. The application, the title, the legal work, the issuance of the check, have all been handled heretofore in the State offices, and it is still done that way, as I understand. The loans having been entirely completed within the State organization, we then find the regional offices set up with employees to handle the papers of loans on which the borrowers have already secured the money. That is one reason why it was difficult for me to get a clear conception of what duties and responsibilities in the regional offices are necessary after the loans have been fully closed and the money paid out through the State organization.

Conceding that there are duties of organization and coordination to perform, I cannot understand why it is necessary to handle the collection of loans and the servicing of loans hundreds and hundreds of miles in many cases from a central regional office. The bills are mailed out from the regional office once a month, as I understand, to each borrower. The borrowers were at one time required, as the Senator from South Carolina indicated, to send all remittances to the regional offices, in some cases more than 500 miles away. I understood the Senator from South Carolina to say they now have the option of paying at the State office.

Mr. BYRNES. My understanding is that it is now proposed that the responsibility for following up delinquent mortgagors, including mail-collection efforts, is to be placed on the district officers under State and regional supervision. I think that is certainly correct.

The senior Senator from Alabama as well as the junior Senator from Alabama have stated that collections from the mortgagors cannot possibly be made by mail with the same success as by individual contact. If we did not have the local agencies, there might be some excuse for doing the best that could be done by mail, but when we have local offices and local employees, I do not see why we should not use them to greater advantage. It is my information that it is proposed now to resort to local offices, and I wondered whether the Senator from Alabama had information along that line. If he has not, possibly the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] could tell us.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator from Alabama will yield——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Certainly.

Mr. BULKLEY. I understand the present plan is to have mail collections through the regional offices, and remittances made to regional offices; but when delinquencies go beyond the period as to which correspondence is considered sufficient, and it becomes necessary to follow up with personal calls and further servicing, it is the practice to perform these services through the State and district offices.

Mr. BYRNES. Is the Senator referring to the proposed regulation which has been adopted this month and is to be put in effect?

Mr. BULKLEY. I understand it has been adopted, but I cannot tell the Senator to what extent it is in effect.

Mr. BYRNES. If the Senator from Alabama will yield further, I will read what the new department is supposed to do:

> The servicing of delinquent loans, as well as other activities arising in connection with properties acquired by the Corporation, will be centered in a district servicing department under the direction of a district servicing supervisor, who will be a member of the staff of the district manager, similar to the district counsel, district appraiser, or district reconditioning supervisor.

These district servicing departments will be provided with such equipment and staffed with such personnel as the need of the respective districts indicate to be essential. The district servicing supervisor and his staff, as all other State and district personnel under the now-effective personnel procedure of the field manual, will be employed only with the approval of the regional office.

If my information is correct, it is proposed now to put into each district office a district servicing supervisor, who is to have charge of the servicing of the loans, so there will be put back into district offices under this official the responsibility for the servicing. Has the Senator from Ohio that information?

Mr. BULKLEY. I am not quite clear as to the purport of the Senator's statement. I do not think there is a district supervisor for the general servicing of all loans but simply to follow up delinquencies.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. REYNOLDS in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. Does that cover the situation which I have in mind? I have been informed that in my State collections are required to be sent to the district offices if made by money order or check, but the State offices may make the collections in cash.

Mr. BYRNES. The original provision in the Regional Manual is:

State, district, and other representatives must direct the borrower to make his loan payments of principal and/or interest to the regional office. Under no circumstances are collectors, agents, or other employees of the Corporation to accept checks, cash, money orders, or any other form of payment, except the duly authorized representatives in the regional offices.

Mr. BULKLEY. Does the Senator understand that that order has been rescinded?

Mr. BYRNES. I have read what is supposed to be the new order. There was a question in my mind as to whether it was rescinded or modified, because the Senator from Ohio asked the question whether this new district servicing official is to have jurisdiction only of delinquent loans, and I should so construe the language I have read, which language is:

The servicing of delinquent loans, as well as all other activities arising in connection with properties acquired by the Corporation, will be centered in a district servicing department.

I am not clear as to whether they will discontinue the requirement that all cash must be sent to the regional office and permit the local officials to collect. Certainly under this language, if they are to have a district servicing supervisor in every district office, he will be appointed for the purpose of supervising delinquent loans.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I do not care to go into a refinement about whether an order has been rescinded or modified; but I do understand that the prohibition against State and district officers receiving cash payments is simply not in existence. They are authorized to accept cash payments, and required to remit them to the regional office.

Mr. BYRNES. I think under the regulation which existed up to this month the statement is that under no circumstances should they accept them.

Mr. BULKLEY. Yes; I think there was such a regulation.

Mr. BYRNES. Now there has been a change.

Mr. BULKLEY. There is no question about that.

Mr. BYRNES. And I confess, from the language, I am in some doubt as to whether the change permits these officers to accept cash payments.

Mr. BULKLEY. I am advised that they do accept them.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield there, Mr. Fahey before the subcommittee stated that not only in State but in district offices they are setting up what they call cashier offices for the purpose of receiving these payments, so that it is not necessary to send them to the regional headquarters.

Mr. BYRNES. With the permission of the Senator from Alabama, what caused me to ask the question of the Senator from Ohio was this:

Heretofore, we all agree, the requirement of the manual was that the money should be sent to the regional office. Now there is a change, and an official is to be placed in each district office, known as the "district servicing supervisor", who is to have the power I have read. If we are appointing, in the district offices, supervisors to have charge of this collection—which, in my opinion, is a very wise course to pursue—it is one additional reason why there is no sound argument for the continuance of the regional office.

When the question of the foreclosure of a mortgage arises in a State, it is sent to the regional office, and the regional officers pass upon it; but then, my information is, it comes to the assistant manager in Washington for final determination. So the question is first passed upon in the State, then in the regional office, and then in the Washington office. Why it cannot be submitted directly from the State to the Washington office is what I do not understand. I can see no reason now for the existence of the regional office; and, if the Senator from Alabama will permit me, I should like to make a brief statement as to the expense.

From June 1934 to March 1935 there was a decrease in the monthly pay roll of the State offices of $251,303.62. There was a decrease in the monthly pay roll of the home office in Washington during the same period of $5,778.42. There was an increase in the monthly pay roll of the regional offices of $472,946. So the expense in Washington decreased only $5,778 a month, while the expense in the regional offices increased $472,946 per month, and the expense in the State offices decreased $251,000 a month.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield there, what period does that cover?

Mr. BYRNES. That covers from June 1934 until March 1935. That is as to pay roll; but the total operating expense shows that in the State offices there was a decrease of $319,935.48 per month and a total decrease in the home office of $111,630 per month, and an increase in the regional offices of $566,567 per month. So the total of all these offices shows that instead of a decrease there was an increase during the period mentioned of $135,000 per month. The net effect of the establishment of the offices is to increase the monthly expenditure $135,000 per month.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. In that connection, I think it ought to be stated that Mr. Fahey testified that the number of employees in the Washington office had been reduced from around 3,000 to around 2,000, but that if it had been necessary to continue from the Washington office the services that were being rendered by the various regional offices, instead of 2,000 or even 3,000, it would have required between six and seven thousand employees in the city of Washington, and it would have been physically impossible for them to have been housed or to have performed their duties without confusion and without inefficiency.

Mr. BANKHEAD. And without sending them to the States to do it.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from South Carolina that there is some probability that the figures he has read as to the reduction in the State offices and the increase in the regional offices arise out of the fact that the various district offices in the States, under the jurisdiction of the State offices, have been largely consolidated; and therefore the expenses of the State offices have been decreased, and the expenses of the regional offices somewhat increased.

For example, in my own State I know that at least five district offices in the western part of the State have been abolished and consolidated into one district office; and that has necessitated a very material reduction in personnel and consequently in expense. I think that accounts for the apparent reduction in the State offices.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. BYRNES. One minute, because of the statement of the Senator from Virginia. If that is general it would account for the reduction, though I have no information that it has been general; but there has been a reduction in the number of employees in the State offices.

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES. When loan activities are resumed in State offices, it is fair to assume that there will necessarily be an increase to some extent of the employees in the State offices; but the point which is made is that if now the Board has changed its policy, and is going to place back in the States the servicing of loans, as was indicated by the recent change, and the determination as to whether a mortgage shall be foreclosed must finally be made by the assistant manager in the city of Washington, then there is no very strong reason for the continuation of the regional offices; and when it is apparent that it has resulted in quite an increase in pay roll and in other expenses, I doubt the necessity of continuing them. The net increase after we had the reductions to which the Senator refers amounts to $135,000 per month. That is more than a million dollars per year.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think it ought to be stated that the net increase in the regional offices there represents probably the total expense from the time they began. My recollection is that these regional offices were established about the middle of last summer.

Mr. BYRNES. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. So that any expense charged to the regional offices would be a net increase, because prior to that they did not exist.

Mr. GLASS. As a matter of fact, if the Senator will permit me, to my personal knowledge a large reduction in personnel and in expense of the district offices in my State has been due to the very superior qualifications of the State officers.

Mr. BYRNES. I must say, in response to the first statement, that there has been a decrease in the pay roll of the State offices of $251,303. There has been an increase in pay rolls by the establishment of the regional offices of $473,000.

Mr. BARKLEY. What I was saying is that all the expense of the regional offices represents an increase, because prior to that they did not exist; so that the total amount would be charged as an increase.

Mr. BYRNES. Of course. The only thing it means is, viewing the organization as a whole, that the taxpayer is now paying $135,000 per month more by reason of the establishment of the regional offices. If we take away 10 up here and put back 20 here, and the result is that we have an additional expense of $135,000 per month, the taxpayer pays the bill.

I apologize to the Senator from Alabama for taking so much of his time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am very glad, indeed, to have the Senator's very helpful statement.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, on the question of expense, there has been no actual saving when we have increased the expenditures, as shown by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES]. As a matter of fact there should have been a saving, because loans ceased; but instead of having a saving when loans ceased, we reduced the expenses in the various State offices where the people were supposed to come in direct contact with the men who borrowed the money, and we increased the expenses in the regional offices hundreds of miles removed, where they could not come in contact with the borrower.

As stated by the Senator from South Carolina, it is difficult to understand what the regional office has left to do. We now say that we are going to adopt the businesslike method, according to the information given us, and have loans collected by people close to the borrowers of the money. Everybody knows that should have been done all the time. There never was the slightest excuse for putting a regional office in the city of Atlanta, Ga., to collect money from a borrower in the southern part of the State of Florida. It is ridiculous. It was absurd in the beginning, and it is still absurd, to suggest any such necessity. With a large aggregation of 4,400 lawyers, executives, and various officials hundreds of miles removed from the people who actually owe the money, what situation do we find? There are no loans being made. Therefore, we need no regional offices to make loans; that is, we needed none up to the time of the passage of this bill. We now propose to leave the business of collecting the money to the State offices, where it should have been all the time. Therefore, the regional office has nothing left in the way of collections.

What is there left for the regional office to do? The two objects of establishing it were to make loans and to make collections. We are now transferring to the State offices, where it should have been all the time, the power to make collections.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, let me say to my colleague that that is not being done. They are doing that only in the event of default.

Mr. BLACK. At last they are recognizing the fact that if a borrower down in the southern part of Alabama wants to pay someone closer to him than in Atlanta, Ga., he may have the privilege of making the payment closer if he will default in the payments on his mortgage. We are not recognizing the fact that the best way to collect from the borrowers is to have someone close enough to them so that they will not be inconvenienced by having to send their money thousands of miles away.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. MURPHY. What would the Senator think of a local building-and-loan association, which had made a loan on a home, transferring the collection of the interest to some point 200 miles away?

Mr. BLACK. We would think just exactly what every man who thinks about the pending matter is bound to observe. We would think that the private lending company was on the way to bankruptcy or that some were getting jobs somewhere which they did not need.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, it was stated a few moments ago—and I should like to state it again, because I am sure that Senators are talking on a wholly wrong theory—that payments are accepted at the local offices, the district offices, and the State offices.

Mr. BLACK. Since when has that been done?

Mr. BULKLEY. It started very recently.

Mr. BLACK. Does the Senator know how recently?

Mr. BULKLEY. No; I do not know how recently. I quite agree with the Senator's remark as to what the condition was previously, but his statement does not apply to the condition which now exists.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield further?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. MURPHY. Will not the Senator from Ohio develop what the functions of the regional office are; what duties it is performing; what the necessity for its existence is?

Mr. BULKLEY. I think perhaps we are trespassing a good deal on the time of the Senator from Alabama. I shall be glad to undertake the discussion later.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, we assume in this amendment that there is some sort of need for some kind of service at a regional office. That concession was made in the hope that we could get an adjustment of this matter and have an acceptance by the committee of the fact that all business relating to collections of loans should be handled in the State organization. But they did not accept it.

As I have said, I do not see any need of a regional office at all. The loans are closed in the State offices. The amendment simply provides that collections and the servicing of loans shall be handled within the States. That is the concrete proposition presented, whether or not the regional office is needed for other purposes.

I do not conceive that there can be any reasonable argument or insistence that loans should be handled in some cases five or six hundred miles away from the homes of the borrowers. The large number of accountants, auditors, typists, and stenographers in each regional office can be distributed out among the States from which some of them come. Let them go home to do the work. It is said they have been drawn from the State organizations. Let them be sent back. The work can be done as well at home, in the State headquarters, as by any aggregation brought together at a regional point.

Nothing is involved in the amendment except the question as to the place from which the bills shall be sent out. If I am told that the simple process of taking from the records a statement of the account of each borrower is a matter which must be handled by one possessing great skill, with technical supervision, at some regional office remote from the home of the borrower, I reply that there is no reason for any such statement. I favor getting back closer to the people in the administration of their affairs, taking at least that part of this program which is, in large measure, merely a clerical one to a place where the employees can be in offices at their homes where they can do the work as well as they can do it elsewhere.

It is said now the borrowers are allowed to come in and pay without going to the regional office for that purpose. Every borrower ought to be allowed to do that, whether he pays in cash or by check. The collecting officers, or officials, or agents, or whatever they may be called, ought to be close to the borrowers, so that when trouble may arise, when excuses or reasons are to be presented for some short delay in meeting the payments, the borrowers may reach the officials without riding hundreds of miles.

How is the matter of tax payments or tax defaults to be serviced? Are representatives to be sent out from the regional office to ride from State to State, and from county to county, in order to check the tax records to see whether there are defaults in the payment of taxes upon mortgaged property? Are the agents to be sent back to check so as to find whether or not at some later date those tax liens have been removed by payment? Is a regional office hundreds of miles away to keep track of all notices of tax sales in all the counties in all the States in each region?

I submit that it is a cumbersome system, it is a pyramiding system. If the desire is to decentralize, let us decentralize, and bring this business back to the doors of the people, where they will have reasonable opportunity to go and talk over their business, where they may take their money, or take their checks, and make settlement, and get their receipts, and discuss any matter necessary to be discussed.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. DUFFY. I not only am very happy to support the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama, but I should have been willing to support the first suggestion he made—that the regional offices be abolished entirely.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the Senator will offer the amendment, I am sure he knows from what I have said that I will most cheerfully support it.

Mr. DUFFY. The difficulty is, as I see it, that our policy has been to make it as hard as possible to make collections, instead of following the business practice which has been well established, but which we have refused to heed, the practice followed by every private business concern that has had any considerable experience in collecting from a number of borrowers, especially those who have made loans. It must be made convenient for the borrowers to pay. Instead we threw up all the barriers we could. We would not accept cash, and those who were conversant with the people, who knew them, and who made the loans could not do the work. Gradually we have made it a little easier than it previously was, but I think, unless the Senator's amendment shall be agreed to, it will still be a difficult situation. In some way or other this organization has not the psychology to make it as easy as possible for the people who owe the Government to pay. Imagine someone in Superior, Wis., having a man down in Chicago, 450 miles away, write him. The operation is made so difficult that people who have the money available at the time when the money is due spend it for something else.

I certainly hope the Senator's amendment will be agreed to, because it is in accordance with good sound business practice, and with what has been the experience of every business concern that has had this kind of business to deal with.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am very glad, indeed, to have the statement of the Senator from Wisconsin and to have the approval of his good judgment upon this proposal.

As he has indicated, every lender recognizes the importance of personal contacts, especially when borrowers get into difficulty, as so many already are in difficulties about these loans, and as others from time to time will get into difficulties. The importance and the value of personal contacts, personal calls, going over the problems and encouraging the lenders to go forward and meet the payments, cannot be overemphasized. Such contacts cannot be maintained under this remote far-away control, and, as I have submitted to the Senate, there is no sound reason for requiring this organization, simply because they started out on one theory, to stand by it, whether they ought to stand by it or not.

I know they have been active. Senators have told me today that they have had calls over the telephone, both local and long distance, urging them to vote against this amendment. Influence of that character, emanating from some branches of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, has been employed. But we have a right to supervise the manner in which the money is expended. We have a right to supervise the administration and the machinery under which it is to be expended.

If it is the judgment of the Members of the Senate that the collections, all phases of the collections, and the servicing of the collections, looking after defaults and abandonments, and all the other problems, should be handled near the homes of the borrowers, then I submit that we would be doing some little to remedy the existing trouble by the adoption of the limited amendment which I have proposed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MINTON in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] to the committee amendment.

Mr. BULKLEY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, we have had considerable discussion about the advisability of establishing regional offices and as to what work should be performed in the regional offices of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. It seems to me that if some Members of the Senate, perhaps including myself, had been directors of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation it is quite likely that these regional offices would not have been established, or perhaps that they would not have been given the same functions which the Home Owners' Loan Corporation has chosen to give them.

However, I do not think the issue before us here can be determined on the basis of whether any particular administrative policy is a good or a bad one. The issue is whether the Congress desires to supersede the judgment of a board intrusted with the administration of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation on a question which is purely an administrative question.

The Senator from Alabama proposes that within 60 days all the work of the regional offices shall be transferred to and performed by the State organization. The evidence which we had before our subcommittee from the officers of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation is that the principal duty of the regional offices is that of supervising the State offices. The Senator would now have the work of supervising the State offices transferred to the State offices. On its face it is an inconsistency. It is an impracticable way to handle the situation.

It has appeared that the collections are being serviced through the State and local offices, and I quite agree with the Senator from Alabama that ultimately that is the only possible disposition of the work. It is being done under the present administration. The testimony before us is that the purpose of the regional offices is a supervisory purpose, and that the regional offices are made up of people who would otherwise have to be employed in the city of Washington to supervise the State and district and local offices. Do we want to direct the Home Owners' Loan Corporation as to whether their supervision ought to be carried on from the city of Washington or whether it ought to be moved out nearer home and set up in a number of different regions? I submit that it is a question as to which the Congress would not care to take jurisdiction and ought not to take jurisdiction.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I do not desire to consume the time of the Senate except for about 2 or 3 minutes in order that the Senate may know what the issue actually is. It is very simple. The pending amendment does no more than to require that within 60 days from the passage of the bill collections by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation shall be made from the State offices and not from the regional offices.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. BULKLEY. Does not the amendment say "all work at regional offices"?

Mr. ROBINSON. Except supervising of the loans.

Mr. BLACK. Yes, Mr. President; except supervising of the loans.

Mr. BULKLEY. Except supervising the making of the loans.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; except supervising the making of the loans.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That means nothing but collections.

Mr. BLACK. That is what it means—collections.

Mr. BULKLEY. I differ from that statement that it means nothing but collections.

Mr. BLACK. So far as I am concerned, I should be delighted to vote for an amendment which provides that there shall be no regional offices. I see no reason for the regional offices. I think it is wholly unfair to the people of a State who have borrowed from a Home Owners' Loan Corporation to be compelled to make their payments 200, 300, 400, or 500 miles from their homes. It gives them no chance to have personal contact with the representatives of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation; it prevents efficient collection. So far as I have been able to see—and I want to state this frankly and openly—the chief reason for the regional offices so far has been to send people who have had jobs in Washington into the various regions in order to take care of them. I see no reason for that. Forty-four hundred were placed in the regional offices originally, with the idea chiefly of collecting debts. The Senator from Ohio frankly admits that there is now a plan on foot to change the system, as I understand him, and that it is now proposed to have the collections made from the State offices. Am I correct in that assumption?

Mr. BULKLEY. Payments are now accepted at the State offices, and, so far as I know, there has never been any purpose that servicing should not be done through the State and district offices. I do not see how a loan could be serviced through a regional office.

Mr. BLACK. They have hardly been serviced at all down in my section.

Mr. BULKLEY. I think the Senator is quite right about that. I think the servicing of this Corporation is in very bad shape, and I hope it is going to be improved.

Mr. BLACK. That is correct, but the way to improve it is to have representatives who live within the State where the loans are made, where the bills are to be paid, just as close to the borrower as is possible.

Mr. BULKLEY. That is exactly the purpose of the Corporation, as testified in our hearings.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I should like to know what objection, then, the Senator has to this amendment? It does not deal with anything except the collection and servicing of loans.

Mr. BULKLEY. It prevents any supervision of State offices except with respect to the making of loans.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No, it does not; I beg the Senator's pardon; the amendment simply provides for a transfer of certain work from the regional offices. The servicing and collecting of loans shall be within 60 days transferred to and performed by the State offices.

Mr. BULKLEY. Very well. When it comes to supervising the collection of loans, that would have to be done by the very body that is being supervised, according to the Senator's amendment.

Mr. BLACK. The issue, then, is very simple. If the Home Owners' Loan Corporation intends anyhow to do the thing upon which we have been insisting and which has not heretofore been done, why should we not place it in the law?

Mr. BULKLEY. I hope the Senator will understand my position. I do not think the Home Owners' Loan Corporation has exercised perfect judgment, and I am not sure that the Senator and I, had we been sitting on that Board, would in every case have exercised perfect judgment; but I do think that the Home Owners' Loan Corporation Board, being intrusted with the administration of the act, ought to be able to decide the administrative question of where they want their help to be placed.

Mr. BLACK. That might be true if they had not already decided it and decided it wrong; and the Senator and I both agree that they have decided it wrong.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. As I understand, the main function of the regional office now is to deal with delinquent loans. When there has been a default for 30 days or 60 days, the local offices may collect; but when the borrower is in default, say, for 90 days, they must submit the case to the regional office. It is a question, then, whether they will foreclose or whether they will extend the time or make different terms. The regional office looks after those cases that are in default; they determine whether to foreclose a mortgage or advise its foreclosure and send it to Washington or whether to take other action.

Mr. BLACK. As I understand, the Senator has stated just the reverse of what was stated a while ago. It was stated a while ago on the floor that the only way a man who lived in Florida, for instance, would be able to make payment to his home office in Florida was to get in default. If he could arrange to get in default, and far enough in default, he could then go to his State office and make a payment; but if he wanted to pay the debt at the time it was due, it was necessary for him to send the payment to Atlanta, Ga. I take the position that the citizens of Florida ought to be accommodated by having the privilege of making their payments through the officials of the Home Owners' Loan organization in Florida, whether they are in default or not in default. Why should we send men to Atlanta, using that district as an example, and pay them mileage going there, and pay them a per diem while in Atlanta, and pay them mileage when they leave Atlanta, instead of employing officials in Florida, who live in that State, without the necessity for a per diem and without the payment of mileage to go from Atlanta down into Florida to collect debts? It is a system which would not be tolerated a minute by a single private lending agency in America. The Senator from Ohio himself admits that it is wrong; and, therefore, since it is wrong in his judgment, let us abolish it.

Mr. BULKLEY. I know the Senator does not want to misunderstand what I said.

Mr. BLACK. I do not; and if the Senator does not think it is wrong, I will withdraw the statement.

Mr. BULKLEY. What I said was that had the Senator and I been directors we might have decided this question differently. I am not sure but that we might have been wrong if we had decided it differently. The point is that those who have the best facilities for knowing how it should be done have decided it this way.

There is another point. Does the Senator think that under the present practice men are sent out from the regional office to service loans and to make collections from customers?

Mr. BLACK. No; I think that, under the present practice, there has been no method at all. So far as I can find, there has been no system of collections at all in the section from which I come. I have had letters from people complaining of that very condition, that there was no method of payment.

Mr. BULKLEY. I am sorry to say that there is too much truth in the Senator's statement, and there has been a certain failure in my own State, too; but it is not the practice to send out collectors from regional offices; it is not the theory to send out collectors from regional offices; and the argument the Senator is making along that line is not in point. The collectors are always sent out from the State and district offices.

Mr. BLACK. May I ask the Senator if it has not been contemplated from the very beginning of the regional offices that they would collect through their own employees; and further if they have not accepted applications from people who wanted collection jobs and required always that they go to the regional offices and not to the State offices.

Mr. BULKLEY. I am sure the Senator is absolutely wrong about that. The only collections of the regional offices are mail collections. The mail collections have been transferred to the regional offices from Washington. Mail collections originally were made at the main office in Washington, and subsequently were transferred to the regional offices. While I agree with the Senator that there has been a good deal of time consumed in organizing any system whatever designed to follow the matter directly to the customer, certainly there has been no attempt to pursue the customer either from Washington or from the regional offices. It has always been contemplated that that should be done by the State and local offices, and it will undoubtedly be done better in the future as the organization is further perfected. However, I am sure that the Senator misunderstands the situation if he thinks that collectors are going to be sent out or have been sent out from the regional offices.

Mr. BLACK. I might say to the Senator that I believe they should not have been sent out, and I doubt if they will be sent out after this debate. I am satisfied that the method was proposed to have the collection handled in the regional offices, and that gradually they were going to draw in everything that was within the various State and district offices into the regional offices where men have been sent from the city of Washington, gathered from the four corners of the Nation in order to officer the various regional offices.

Mr. BULKLEY. Of course I do not undertake to say what mental processes the Board may have gone through in the past, but I am sure that recently there has been no such attempt.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is familiar with the fact, is he not, that until recently a State office had no authority at all to make a collection?

Mr. BULKLEY. That is quite true, but it has been corrected.

Mr. BLACK. It has only been corrected within the last few days.

Mr. BULKLEY. I join the Senator in the thought that it should have been corrected sooner.

Mr. BANKHEAD. They have not corrected the system of sending out from the regional offices the bills and notices and all that kind of thing.

Mr. BULKLEY. There is a satisfactory reason for that. They testified that their billing machines are made up for large units and can be more efficiently operated from the regional offices than from the local offices. So far as mail payments are concerned, what difference can it make to the customer, whose letter will go just as well to the regional office as to the local office?

Mr. BLACK. It makes a great deal of difference to the man who lives down in the southern part of Florida when he gets a notice by mail whether he can have the right and privilege to go to his nearest State office and seek a conference with reference to that collection.

Mr. BULKLEY. Of course he can do that, but if he is going to mail a letter what difference does it make to him whether he mails it to Jacksonville or Atlanta?

Mr. BLACK. Of course if the Senator wants to give the organization the privilege of mailing letters from Atlanta to Alabama and Florida and Arkansas and Texas, and mailing letters from Chicago to Wisconsin and Idaho, and mailing letters from Kansas over into Iowa and other places, then we might just simply provide that they may mail their letters from a selected point far removed from the home of the debtor.

Mr. BULKLEY. It is fair to say that a large proportion of the payments do come in as the result of mail billing and do come in by mail, and unless that were true the operation of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation would be very expensive indeed.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BULKLEY. I will yield with the permission of the Senator from Alabama, who has the floor.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does not this system require duplication of records? Whenever there is a default, is it not necessary to send the files and engage in long correspondence from one office to the other?

Mr. BULKLEY. I do not so understand. I understand that the files are kept at the regional offices and that the billings are made by the large billing machines.

Mr. BANKHEAD. How is it possible to inform the State office of the status of a default if all the correspondence and the whole record are not sent?

Mr. BULKLEY. The files are sent only when they are specifically required for personal servicing.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then it is a duplication.

Mr. BULKLEY. I do not think it is a duplication. The file is held at the regional office, and the billings are made from there. If the payments come in within 90 days or so of the time they are due that is all that has happened, and the cost of servicing has been saved. After 90 days, if the account has not been paid, the whole file is sent to the State or the district office, the very place where the servicing ought to be done.

Mr. BLACK. Here is what results: There is an office, for instance, in Idaho. It is a local office. Of course, it must have a record of the files. It would be a strange thing that the office of a corporation closest to the people should not know whether or not a man owed them. We must have a regional office within a few hundred miles. I do not know where the regional office is that covers Idaho, but perhaps 700 or 800 miles away. That regional office must have a file. Then there must be a file in Washington. Before long we will have another regional office between the first regional office and the home office.

Then we will have what everybody criticizes the Government for having in every business it undertakes—waste, clerks who do nothing, officials who do nothing but draw their salaries, a clerk to supervise the work done by another clerk who is looking over the work of another clerk a thousand miles away, and, after all, when something finally comes up it must come to Washington.

A letter is written to Washington, and there it is said, "Our files show this bill has not been paid." It is traced down to the first regional office two or three hundred miles away. There it is said, "The record in our office does not show it has been paid." They go to the next regional office and finally get away down to the little office out in Idaho, and the man there reports, "This was paid 7 months ago, and I have issued a receipt for it." That is what happens.

Mr. BULKLEY. The Senator does not speak by the record when he says there has to be a file of all these things in Washington.

Mr. BLACK. I speak according to human experience since the celebrated case of Jarndyce v. Jarndyce, made famous in Dickens' beautiful novel. Everybody knows when we set up an office, the employees of that office have to have something to do. They put in their files and hire their clerks and lawyers.

How many lawyers are there in the regional offices?

Mr. BANKHEAD. There are 204.

Mr. BLACK. Before long they will have 500 or 600. Of course, there may be some more regional offices, too. Perhaps they will come a little closer to some Senator's State than they are now. At the same time, away back somewhere along the line a little home owner finds himself enmeshed in the red tape of multitudinous offices—not duplicating, but triplicating—and probably by next month there will be another regional office for him to go through.

I submit if we want to make the Home Owners' Loan Corporation a success, where we find a set-up of useless offices, with supervisory powers which are not needed, taking away the privilege from a man who owes money to pay it as he looks into the face of the agent of the Corporation, making it necessary to employ and hire new clerks on a new per diem and new mileage, what we really ought to do is to amend the amendment of my colleague and tell the office here in Washington to dispense with these useless regional offices which now perform no services except of a parasitical nature, to draw from the resources of the Corporation when it is wholly and completely unnecessary to do so?

Whatever may be the attitude of Senators from other States, I insist that the home owners who owe money in the State of Alabama have a right to make their payments at the closest available office. I insist it is more economical than is any other method. I insist it is more efficient. I insist by that method we are more likely to get officers who know their psychology than we are by drawing somebody from a State a thousand or fifteen hundred miles away to supervise the regional office. I am opposed to any such system as is now in vogue. I believe so far as possible in having the offices manned with personnel familiar with local problems and local people.

The only regret I have with reference to my colleague's amendment is that it is not in its original form. He changed it only because of an adverse report by the subcommittee and struck out the provision relating to regional offices. Knowing that the principle is wrong, we ought to write our knowledge into the law. I hope the Senate will adopt the amendment of my colleague.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I do not know that I can enlighten the Senate any further on the subject, but there are two or three things I should like to submit before we vote.

So far as I now recall, there is not an important branch of the Government of the United States which deals with problems all over the country which does not have regional offices. The Civil Service Commission, which holds examinations for the appointment of civil-service employees all over the United States, has divided the United States into regions, and there is a regional office covering each one of the regions which deals with applicants and examinations relating to civil-service employees in a certain group of States over which the superintendent of that regional office has jurisdiction.

The Federal Alcohol Control Administration has the same arrangement. The income-tax division of the Bureau of Internal Revenue has regional offices which supervise those who are employed in the collection of income taxes in the various States within the region over which they have jurisdiction.

The Federal land banks do the same thing, as do the Federal Reserve banks. So far as I can recall, there is not a department of Government that deals with problems which affect the States in an intimate capacity which does not have a regional set-up over which presides a regional director.

It is easy to rise in the Senate and berate some board which has had upon its shoulders the responsibility of administering a law which applies to millions of our people. It is easy for us to rise here and say that if we had been administering the law we would have done it differently from the way it has been done by those who have been charged with administering it. But in writing the law we do not undertake to go into details of administration. We are bound to write the law in general terms and leave it to those charged with the responsibility of administration to work out the details of the administration.

What happened with the Home Owners' Loan Corporation was that at the beginning they set up a manager in every State. They authorized the State manager to establish certain branch offices in the State. In my State there were established four or five or possibly six; I do not at the moment recall just how many. In charge of each of those branches was a branch or State director or manager. The State director or State manager was required to deal with Washington on every proposition that arose where there was any dispute on any question or where he himself did not have the authority to act.

Mr. Fahey testified before the subcommittee that they had at the peak, I believe, about 2,900 or 3,000 employees in Washington before they established the regional offices. That was long before the peak of applications came in, when every one of them had to come to Washington. If there was a dispute about appraisal, if there was a dispute about the law to determine whether or not the applicant was entitled to a loan, or whether his property was eligible, or any one of a thousand questions that might arise in the administration of the law, the State director was required to take up the matter with the Board here in Washington. The result was long delay. The result would have been inefficiency.

It was almost impossible for the Home Owners' Loan Corporation to get quarters in Washington for 2,000 employees. They had to be scattered all around Washington, some in the different District buildings, some of them in the Department of Commerce, some of them in the Department of Justice, some of them at one place and others at some other place. If a Member of Congress desired to confer with anybody in the Home Owners' Loan Corporation it took half a day to run around over Washington and find where he was located.

In order to do away with that situation the 11 regional offices were established. Prior to their establishment there were chosen certain key men in Washington who had been given charge of certain States so they might become familiar with conditions and the situation in the States which were assigned to them for administration here in Washington. When these regional offices were established, these men who had been key men in the headquarters in Washington dealing with certain States were, in the main, put in charge of the States with which they had been dealing prior to the establishment of the regional offices.

Mr. Fahey testified that if all the work now being done by the regional directors and the regional offices had been required to be done in the city of Washington, it would have required between six and seven thousand employees, and that it would have been a physical impossibility not only to find quarters for them in Washington but for them to work efficiently in the administration of this law, responsibility for which has been placed upon their shoulders. Therefore, these regional offices were established.

It may be that some of us here could have done it better. I suppose most of us are willing to admit that we could have done it better and more efficiently if we had had the responsibility. We did not have it, however; and I do not think we can very wisely undertake to go into detail with respect to the minutiæ of administration of a law that involved so many complications and so many problems and so many local situations as this law.

I think we are all prepared to admit that the Home Owners' Loan Corporation has done a fine job. It has rendered a service to the people of this Nation which could not have been rendered otherwise. It has established these 11 regional offices, and we now propose either to abolish them or to take away their jurisdiction. I think they ought to be allowed to remain as they now are.

It is not very material whether a man who owes monthly payments, or who is amortizing a loan which has been refinanced under the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, writes a letter from Mayfield to Paducah, where there is a branch office under the State manager, or from Mayfield to Louisville, or whether he writes a letter to Memphis, which is the regional office for 4, 5, or 6 States in that part of the country.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to interrupt the Senator to read just a line from a recent letter I have received on this subject. After having examined the operations of these regional offices, having contacted the Atlanta office and the personnel and the officers there, the writer says:

> I believe that I am voicing the opinion of all the personnel in the Florida State organization when I say that we would hate to see any change made in the present set-up, either as to the location of the office or as to its management and personnel. This is said in the interest of the borrowers as well as the whole organization.

He believes it to be a great mistake; that they are serving well, operating well, functioning well.

Mr. BARKLEY. I appreciate that statement from the Senator. So far as I am concerned, I do not believe I have had a single complaint from anybody in my State with respect to the operation of the regional offices.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to enable me to address a question to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. Since the Senator has read a statement of approval of the regional office, I think it would be only fair to state whether or not the gentleman who wrote that statement is employed by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation.

Mr. FLETCHER. He is connected with the organization.

Mr. BARKLEY. He probably was connected with the State office prior to the establishment of the regional office.

Mr. FLETCHER. He was connected with the State office, not with the regional office.

Mr. BARKLEY. Many of these employees were taken from the State offices and put in the regional offices because they had grown up with the work, and they understood it, and they understood the problems of the State from which they came. I think it was a wise thing on the part of the regional managers to draw from each of the States somebody who had grown up into the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, who was familiar with it in his State, and who could at least help the regional managers to solve problems that arose which came from the States they represented.

Mr. BLACK. Has the Senator been informed by this corporation that it drew on each of the States for the personnel in the regional office? If he has, I am satisfied that it is a mistake.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know that I have asked that categorical question, but my understanding has been, and I think Mr. Fahey so testified before the committee, that, as a rule, they have drawn from the States. If there has been some one State from which they drew nobody, I do not know anything about it. If Alabama happens to be such a State, I am very sorry for it, but I doubt very seriously whether it is true.

Mr. BLACK. I may state to the Senator that it was my belief that if we were going to set up regional offices, each State ought to have some representation, in order to take care of the interests of the State, which I tried to present to the Board. I was not trying to get employment for some man who did not have employment.

Mr. BARKLEY. My experience with Federal employees leads me to believe that the more of them you can keep in your own State, and not let them get too far away, the better off you are.

Mr. BLACK. I think perhaps the Senator is correct, but in this connection I may state that the regional officers did not draw on the Alabama office for their personnel.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know about that.

Mr. BLACK. I do not know whether it has been the custom or not. I think the regional offices would have been much better off if they had drawn their personnel from the various States in the region, so that they would be familiar with the local problems. I agree with the Senator as to that.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think that has been the policy. I think Mr. Fahey has stated that of the combined lists of employees in the various regional offices, some 450 or 500 had been drawn from the various State offices in the regions which they represented. It may be that some States did not get in on it. I do not know just what the test was; but, as a rule, that is what they tried to do.

I believe that to adopt this amendment, or any amendment undertaking to handicap the Board in the administration of these regional offices, would make for inefficiency and confusion, and would undo a lot of good work that they have been doing and are now doing.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Costigan	King	Schall
Austin	Couzens	La Follette	Schwellenbach
Bachman	Cutting	Lewis	Sheppard
Bankhead	Dickinson	Lonergan	Smith

Carey	Hatch	Reynolds
Connally	Hayden	Robinson
Copeland	Keyes	Russell

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether or not there is any foundation for the rumor, which seemed to me to be something more than a rumor, that the central Board here has in contemplation the abolition of the State offices.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I am very confident that there is nothing in that rumor, because before our committee the chairman of the Board repeatedly stated that it is his purpose to have loans serviced through the State offices.

Mr. GLASS. Is there anything in the bill which would authorize the central Board to abolish the State offices?

Mr. BULKLEY. There is nothing in the bill on that subject one way or the other. I presume they would have a right to abolish the State offices if they saw fit, but I could not imagine their doing such a thing.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator that I talked this morning to the director, Mr. Fahey, and he told me positively that they never did have any such intention of abolishing the State offices. It never entered his mind, and he said, "I think I would have known something about it if that had been the purpose."

Mr. GLASS. That is a matter in which I am particularly interested. It may be a local consideration, but the State officer in Virginia has made such an extraordinarily good record that I should dislike very much to see him dispensed with.

Mr. FLETCHER. I imagine the State offices will be in existence for 15 years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] to the committee amendment.

Mr. BULKLEY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. I understand that if he were present he would vote as I intend to vote, and, therefore, I am privileged to vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. AUSTIN. I desire to announce that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] is absent on account of illness.

I also wish to announce that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] has a general pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN].

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] has a general pair with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. MCGILL].

I am not advised how any of these Senators would vote if present.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY], and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON] are detained on account of illness.

I desire to announce also that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MOORE], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. MCGILL], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH] are necessarily detained from the Senate.

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 49, as follows:

Coolidge	Long	Moore

So Mr. BANKHEAD's amendment to the committee amendment was rejected.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk, which I desire to offer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the committee amendment, in section 26, page 31, line 8, it is proposed to strike out the words "or improved by", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 26. (a) The first sentence of section 2 of the National Housing Act is amended (1) by striking out "January" and inserting in lieu thereof "April", and (2) by inserting before the period at the end thereof a comma and the following: "including the installation of new equipment and machinery."

(b) The last sentence of section 2 of the National Housing Act is amended to read as follows: "No insurance shall be granted under this section to any such financial institution with respect to any obligation representing any such loan, advance of credit, or purchase by it (1) unless the obligation bears such interest, has such maturity, and contains such other terms, conditions, and restrictions, as the Administrator shall prescribe; and (2) unless the amount of such loan, advance of credit, or purchase is not in excess of $2,000, except that in the case of any such loan, advance of credit, or purchase made for the purpose of such financing with respect to real property improved by or to be converted into apartment or multiple family houses, hotels, office, business or other commercial buildings, hospitals, orphanages, colleges, schools, churches, or manufacturing or industrial plants, such insurance may be granted if the amount of the loan, advance of credit, or purchase is not in excess of $50,000."

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I offer this amendment at the suggestion and request of the Housing Administrator, with the consent and approval of the Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency. I have not had opportunity to take it up with the committee.

On page 31, in section 26, we provided for the amendment of title I of the National Housing Act by increasing the limit on loans which may be insured from $2,000 up to $50,000 for certain purposes. Among those purposes we provided for was the conversion of property into apartments or multiple family houses, but we did not provide for conversion into other forms of property on which loans might be made.

The Administrator sees no reason why we should not provide for the financing of the improvements which will convert property into hotels, office, business, or other commercial buildings, hospitals, and so forth, as further provided in the bill, and he asks that this amendment be incorporated in the bill so as to make funds available for converting property into buildings for those purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I offer a further amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the committee amendment, in section 15, page 25, line 5, after the numerals "15", it is proposed to insert "(a)", and on page 26, between lines 10 and 11, to insert the following:

(b) Section 9 of the act entitled "An act to guarantee the bonds of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, to amend the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, and for other purposes", approved April 27, 1934, is hereby repealed.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 15. (a) Section 4 of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof a new subsection to read as follows:

"(n) The Corporation is authorized to purchase Federal Home Loan Bank bonds, debentures, or notes, or consolidated Federal home-loan bank bonds or debentures. The Corporation is also authorized to purchase full-paid-income shares of Federal savings and loan associations after the funds made available to the Secretary of the Treasury for the purchase of such shares have been exhausted. Such purchases of shares shall be on the same terms and conditions as have been heretofore authorized by law for the purchase of such shares by the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That the total amount of such shares in any one association held by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Corporation shall not exceed the total amount of such shares heretofore authorized to be held by the Secretary of the Treasury in any one association. The Corporation is also authorized to purchase shares in any institution which is (1) a member of a Federal home-loan bank and (2) whose accounts are insured under title IV of the National Housing Act, if the institution is eligible for insurance under such title; and to make deposits and purchase certificates of deposit and investment certificates in any such institution. Of the total authorized bond issue of the Corporation $300,000,000 shall be available for the purposes of this subsection, without discrimination in favor of Federally chartered associations, and bonds of the Corporation not exceeding such amount may be sold for the purposes of this subsection."

(b) Section 9 of the act entitled "An act to guarantee the bonds of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, to amend the Home Owners' Loan act of 1933, and for other purposes", approved April 27, 1934, is hereby repealed.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, this amendment is offered to correct an error due to a misunderstanding in the committee report. It is also offered with the approval of the Chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee. The language which it is proposed to repeal by the amendment is the following:

The Home Owners' Loan Corporation is authorized to buy bonds or debentures of Federal home-loan banks upon such terms as may be agreed upon or to loan money to Federal home-loan banks upon such terms as may be agreed upon, but not to exceed $50,000,000, shall be invested or advanced under this section.

The Home Owners' Loan Corporation has never used any of that authorization. In section 15, page 25, of the pending bill we have provided for the same authority and a little greater authority, and we have provided a fund of $300,000,000 which is available for the purpose. I am sure all members of the committee thought, as I thought, that the $300,000,000 was inclusive of all amounts which had heretofore been made available for that purpose; but by checking with the legislative counsel we found that we had failed to repeal that section of the act of April 27, 1934.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there are no further amendments to be proposed, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BULKLEY. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment, ask for a conference with the House thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. BULKLEY, Mr. WAGNER, Mr. BARKLEY, Mr. MCADOO, Mr. TOWNSEND, and Mr. STEIWER conferees on the part of the Senate.

DETAILED REPORTS ON OCEAN MAIL CONTRACTS

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to call up a resolution which I gave notice yesterday I should ask to have considered today.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Alabama that the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] is not in the Senate Chamber at the present moment.

Mr. BLACK. I desire to give notice that at the earliest possible opportunity, the first day the Senate meets, I shall move, if necessary, to consider the resolution, the adoption of which will bring to the Senate the individual reports made by Postmaster General Farley on the subsidized ocean mail contracts. The Senate is entitled to have those facts; the country is entitled to have those facts; and it is my intention, at the first opportunity I can obtain the floor on the first day the Senate meets, to make a motion, if necessary, to that effect, which will include publishing the reports for the benefit of the people after they have been brought to the Senate.

TRADE COALITIONS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I make bold to call the attention of the Senate at this moment to a matter which is of great interest to those who are attracted to the policy of the reciprocity treaties as proposed by officers of the administration touching trade with the world, particularly in Europe.

I invite the attention of my fellow Senators to the fact that, while the administration is presenting a system extending its courtesies and generosity of trade to the principal nations of Europe, we are informed this morning from sources we cannot dispute that France and Russia have just concluded something of a treaty, ostensibly in the designation of peace, which openly and boldly arranges as between themselves for preference of trade, while the officer of Russia gives the world to understand it is notice to the United States that it should view what is being done as a lesson.

At the same time, Mr. President, we are informed that Germany has entered into an understanding with Russia along the same lines as that which England has found agreeable for her commercial advantages to propose and then adopt as between herself and Russia.

It will be noted that the morning press informs us that England, for reasons of her own, speaking for Britain to the representatives who are assembled at Stresa, has withdrawn all form of strictures upon the policy of Germany, and has refused to allow anything to enter the conference which shall appear to have the endorsement of England touching criticism of the increased armament of Germany, if such criticism carries with it a judgment or any form of condemnation.

It may be that England sees that this is the safer and better method for harmony and for peace. Of that we have no complaint, nor even comment. But when I am compelled to see that, while this Government is extending the favor of its trade treaties to these great nations, in turn for what we felt would be an equal treatment to ourselves, and then see this morning the attitude of one of these great powers withdrawing all opposition to one against which it has been announcing opposition for consecutively 60 days, I cannot but behold that it is all in pursuit of the policy that these countries shall unite themselves in commercial favor between each other, to the discrimination of the United States.

We cannot have failed to have seen the statements as to the trade contracts and the trade compacts now made between France and Germany—something of a consummation devoutly to be wished as between those two countries—and particularly between France and England, and now between England and Russia, which compacts have for their purpose, sir, granting precedent rights of trade one to the other, while the spokesman for Russia does not hesitate to inform the country that these arrangements of special benefits, advantages, and precedences between these nations are for the purpose of serving warning upon the United States, indicating that we should likewise enter into that which is desired by these particular nations, without regard as to how it should affect us.

Mr. President, I wish to suggest to this honorable body that if we have gone so far as to register as a policy that whenever we grant trade favors by a treaty, say, as lately we did to Belgium, the same favors or advantages indicated by such treaty shall be regarded as being equally extended to all other countries upon the same basis, and those other countries at the same time make deliberate contracts and compacts addressed to discrimination against the United States, making it impossible for us to adhere to the doctrine of reciprocity with equal fairness and equal division as between nations, the time has come when this body should inform the world that, while we were pleased to grant to the President of the United States, in great confidence in his capacity and his patriotism, the right to enter into reciprocity treaties and withhold the necessity of submitting them to the United States Senate for approval, now if it shall be the course on the part of other governments, which we desire to favor upon equal terms, to turn about and punish us at every opportunity by discrimination against us, the hour may come when we shall resume the right on the part of this body to supervise such treaties, that we may grant them where we should to those who have granted equal favor and equal opportunity to us, but withhold them and denounce them if they have been made with those nations that turn about and enter into compacts to discriminate in trade against the United States.

For myself, sir, at this moment when I take the liberty to intrude upon the deliberations of this body, let me say that not until this news was lately brought to me did the real consequence of the actions appear, nor, until now, when I have seen the news in public print, have I observed that these nations have boldly advertised to the world that they are giving notice to the United States that the favor as between themselves is intended as a means to serve notice on us.

I say, sir, that the time has come when we should serve notice on them that they will either keep faith, they will either live within the spirit and the policy which we have assumed to extend to them, or should they fail to do so, and constantly enter into compacts which shall discriminate against us by giving favor to those who likewise are in debt to the Government of the United States, none of whom will pay a dollar of the principal nor make provision for the interest, this honorable body reserves the right to resume the control of these treaties, and in the possession of its privileges under the Constitution withhold the power of extending them to nations which have assumed, sir, to discriminate against America.

The time has come, as I see it, when with the advance of every movement which looks like a discrimination against us, we should announce our discovery thereof, should make known our resentment, and should make plain at least, sir, that we will not accept such action in calm, supine surrender.

It is high time, in every instance and everywhere when any nation shall assume to do that which we would regard as unfair and unjust to us while we are extending every form of equity and opportunity to them, that we denounce the injustice; for this is the time, sir, and these are the days when the American must be for America; and in every instance where it appears that other countries which owe us proper deference decline to accede it, the United States Senate will resume the exercise of all its prerogatives and privileges to protect America and aid the President of the United States in carrying out his policies in honor, in fairness, and in justice.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate stand adjourned until 12 o'clock noon on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, April 15, 1935, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, APRIL 12, 1935

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, the world is Thy house; we rest in Thee, for Thou wilt not withdraw from Thy children. Though darkness is about Thy throne, yet here we stay our prayers. Pierced, bereft, and broken hearted, O come to our brothers in yonder section, who are struggling, staggering with trailing, engulfing clouds of famine, starvation, and death. In their shocking grief come from behind the lowering heavens; help them as the barren earth seems to reel beneath their homeless feet. O Comforter of the Most High, rise like a star in untroubled splendor above the lowlands of desolation. Let Thy light break through with tender voice and loving touch. Allow no swollen fears or chattering doubts to deny Him who faced His earthly Jerusalem. May they dissolve like the mountains through the haze at twilight. Heavenly Father, flood the hearts of the suffering ones with new life, new hopes, and a blessed prospect. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that business in order under clause 3 of rule XIII on Monday next; that business in order under clause 6 of rule XXIV on Tuesday next; and that business in order under clause 7 of rule XXIV on Wednesday next be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

CONGRESSIONAL INVESTIGATIONS

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, something like a week ago I obtained unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to place in the RECORD a list formulated by the Legislative Service of the Library of Congress of the various congressional investigations that have been had since and including the Sixty-seventh Congress through the Seventy-third Congress. When this was sent to the Printer it was ascertained that it contained more matter than is permissible under the standing rule.

Mr. Speaker, I now ask special authority from the House to extend my remarks and to include the whole amount, for the reason that I have a letter from the Director of the Legislative Reference Service, Mr. Meyer, to the effect that he has many requests for this matter, and it would be more economical to print it than to have a sufficient number of typewritten copies made to be distributed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, has the Public Printer made an estimate?

Mr. McSWAIN. Yes.

Mr. RICH. What is the estimate?

Mr. McSWAIN. The estimate is that it would cost $900.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I call attention of the membership of the House to the fact that when the Public Printer sends back these estimates they should be announced to the Members of the House. This one item alone will cost $900, according to the estimate. This only takes into consideration those extensions that are over and above two pages, and when we think of the amount of the material that goes into the RECORD we can at once appreciate what the cost to the taxpayers of the country is. That is the reason we are trying to hold the RECORD down. I do not object to this request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I have often been impressed by the thought that one of the most important powers exercised by the Congress, or by either House of the Congress, is the investigation it conducts from time to time into the acts and doings of the executive departments in order to ascertain facts upon which to predicate remedial and corrective legislation. In order to have data regarding previous investigation available, some time ago I requested the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress to compile for me a list of the various investigations by congressional committees conducted by authority of Congress, beginning with March 4, 1921, and going through the Seventy-third Congress.

This work was very thoroughly done, and, believing that it would be of great service to the other Members of Congress and to the country generally, I am offering to have the same published as a part of my remarks.

Mr. Speaker, I regard the Congress as the grand jury of inquest into all Federal matters. It is astounding how the tendency in the mere executive branches is toward violation of the law and misapplication of the funds and property of the Government. I am proud to say that this tendency is always checked before it goes to dangerous limits. But I am firm in the conviction that but for the fact that Congress does sit at least a part of each year, and does from time to time exercise its power of investigation into executive departments, these departments would finally degenerate into a degree of corruption that would finally overthrow the Government. It is not merely what Congress discovers that is the measure of the good done. It is the fact that Congress may investigate that restrains the ordinary impulse and tendency to corruption. But for this ever-present threat, there would undoubtedly be many more instances of the violation of duty and the breach of trust. Let us hope, however, that due to general enlightenment and to a keener sense of public obligation, these examples of official wrongdoing may constantly diminish and that the duty of the Congress to investigate may be less frequently employed. But until such improved condition comes about, the Congress should not hesitate to turn on the light of publicity wherever there is even an appearance of wrongdoing.

Recommendation is made that purchases for C. C. C. "be vested in a single agency of the Government possessing inadequate experience and organization" (S. Rept. 144, 73d Cong., 1st sess., CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 77, p. 5716).

Because of developments in this and "other similar cases of high finance throughout the United States", the committee recommended certain annexed amendments to section 77 B of the Bankruptcy Act in order that unfair profiteering might be decreased. Advantages have been accorded bondholders because of the hearings held by the committee (S. Rept. 107, 74th Cong., 1st sess.).

WHY HEROIZE THE DEAD WHILE THE LIVING STARVE?

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a letter which I addressed to the Buffalo Evening News.

Mr. RICH. Is this a letter that the gentleman has written?

Mr. HOEPPEL. It is.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker and Members, I am in receipt of a communication from the Buffalo Evening News which requests my support to advance the bill of Senator ROYAL S. COPELAND (S. 938), creating a commission to plan a suitable memorial for America's war dead. I replied to this communication as follows:

I acknowledge your circular letter wherein you request support for the Copeland bill, creating a commission to plan a suitable memorial for America's war dead.

I served 28 months in France and I am writing to inform you that if we had less publicity for war and more publicity for peace, it is very likely we would be spared future capitalistic wars. Every home in France is adorned with pictures which appeal to martial thought, and every street corner has a memorial to some man whose greatness consists in having butchered more of his opponents than were butchered on his own side. If the newspapers of the United States and the world would give less publicity to war and more publicity in the interest of peace and a square deal, one to another, we would be spared the enormous tax burden now necessary because of past and future wars.

I yield to no one in respect to America's war dead but these war dead, if they could survey Europe with its dictatorships, with its murderous Hitlers, and others, would consider that they had sacrificed their lives in vain. If they could look back and see the distress and suffering in our own country today, which is primarily due to war, would they wish a memorial to themselves, or would they rather have a living memorial of service and helpfulness to the unemployed, the aged, and the distressed citizens?

If you will publish this letter, your readers can give you the answer.

FEDERAL EXPENDITURES FOR RELIEF IN THE STATE OF NEW JERSEY

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a resolution of the House of Assembly of the State of New Jersey.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution of the House of Assembly of the State of New Jersey by Mr. Pascoe, of Union County, introduced and adopted April 1, 1935:

THE ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY-NINTH LEGISLATURE
OF THE STATE OF NEW JERSEY,
Assembly Chamber, State House, Trenton, N. J.

Whereas the people of New Jersey pay into the Federal Treasury in taxes over $96,000,000 annually, and in allocating the same only about $52,000,000 is returned to the State of New Jersey, including appropriations for emergency relief; and

Whereas we learn from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 22, 1935, that in making appropriations for emergency relief to the various States there are several States which receive a vastly greater percentage of their relief requirements from the Federal Government than does our State of New Jersey; and

Whereas such a plan is manifestly unfair and inequitable to the people of New Jersey as compared with the citizens of other States; and

Whereas there are some 125 municipalities in our State which have defaulted in whole or in part on their municipal obligations or are using scrip to pay their expenses, and the imposition of additional taxes to raise money for emergency relief will further aggravate this financial situation: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the House of Assembly for the State of New Jersey does hereby request our United States Senators and Congressmen to support the request of Governor Hoffman and that they do present the above facts to the Federal Director of Emergency Relief and ask for a more equitable distribution of Federal taxes paid by the people of New Jersey, particularly emergency relief funds; we ask this in the interest of the overburdened taxpayers of our State; and be it still further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded forthwith to the United States Senators and each Congressman from New Jersey and to the Governor of New Jersey.

LESTER H. CLEE,
Speaker of the House of Assembly.

Attest:

FREDERICK A. BOWMAN,
Clerk of the House of Assembly.

I hereby certify that the above is a true and correct copy of a resolution adopted by the house of assembly April 1, 1935.

FREDERICK A. BOWMAN,
Clerk of the House of Assembly.

INHERITED CONCEPTS AND PUBLIC UTILITIES

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I fear this House is suffering from a very advanced case of inherited concepts. It is insisting upon the retention of a lot of outmoded theories and practices peculiar to the eighteenth century. Some of them have been with us so long, perhaps we have developed such a sentimental attachment for them we just cannot bear to be parted from them. It may take a major operation to remove some of these inherited concepts that are keeping our economic system in a comatose condition and rendering some of us almost non compos mentis. Such a major operation might be the beginning of an economic convalescence.

Here is an example of what I mean: A proposal is made to tax the American people to secure money enough to guarantee to every person a monthly income of $200. Immediately comes the cry, "Where are we to get the money?" and "We cannot, under our system, collect enough money to pay a pension of that size." For the sake of argument, grant the contention is sound. Who ever took from Congress the right to change our monetary system when it begins to prevent our doing something we want to do? The proposed bill, H. R. 7260, is to provide security; not to maintain an eighteenth-century monetary system. When we talk security, let us talk in terms of goods and people; not in terms of an inherited concept, a monetary system which cannot be changed to meet changing conditions.

Here is another example of what I mean by inherited concepts: For years we believed the organization of economic activity rested in the market place. That was true once. But now administration has in many instances replaced the market place. Yet we continue to legislate as though the market place were still the controlling factor.

The holding companies in the public-utility field dominate the activities of hundreds of thousands of people within their systems. During the depression, hundreds of little concerns were wiped out. The big ones held on. By 1932, 200 companies controlled something like 54 percent of the wealth of all nonfinancial corporations. What effect can the market place have on this administrative organization? We can no longer rely on the market place as a coordinator of economic activity. We are in the twentieth century. Then let us adopt twentieth-century concepts and forget those inherited from the eighteenth century.

One more example of what I mean: We have the Rayburn-Wheeler bill to gradually eliminate holding companies. People immediately begin to utter the usual platitudes about private property. They are talking about an eighteenth-century private property. Twentieth-century private property is something else again. The words are the same but the concepts are different.

The concept of private property inherited from the eighteenth century contemplated ownership and control vested in one person. This is no longer true in the case of the holding companies. Ownership is lodged in the hands of thousands, but the control of the holding company and its operating company subsidiaries is in the hands of a few financial manipulators at the top who juggle the stocks and interest of the real owners for their own benefit and the inevitable detriment of the owners.

Why, Mr. Speaker, this greedy little group got such a strangle hold on the capital structure of the billions of dilapidated dollars that they almost wrecked the financial system of the country. Who said private property? Even law schools have ceased to indoctrinate their innocents with the inherited concept of an eighteenth-century private property. They are recognizing the dissolution of the old private property and are teaching that property is a bundle of rights and powers—a bundle of relationships between persons.

Let me quote from an article by Gardiner C. Means in the Political Science Quarterly for March 1935. Perhaps it will give a clearer picture of what I have in mind.

> The shift of large segments of economic activity from coordination through the market place to coordination through administered activity has thus gradually sucked controls over economic activity away from the three parties mainly at interest—the security holders, the workers, and the consumers. It has placed this control in the hands of administrators, nominally responsible to the security holders but factually responsible in all too many cases to no one. Such a concentration of controls leaves the security holders, the workers, and the consumers—the forgotten men—with great and basic interests in industrial activity, but with minimum controls over it. Controls without interests lead to irresponsible actions. Interests without controls lead to social frustration.

I want to give a little more time to this proposed holding-company legislation. With this twentieth-century concept of private property, what shall we do about them? We cannot let them go unchecked. We cannot control them. They are too big to control. They can control the boards set up to control them. Hon. Gifford Pinchot, of Pennsylvania, has said:

> Nothing like this gigantic monopoly has ever appeared in the history of the world. Nothing has ever been imagined before that even remotely approaches it in the thorough-going, intimate, unceasing control it may exercise over the daily life of every human being within the web of its wires. It is immeasurably the greatest industrial fact of our time. If uncontrolled, it will be a plague without previous example. If effectively controlled in the public interest, it can be made incomparably the greatest material blessing in human history.

Carl D. Thompson has this to say:

> Hearings developed the fact that the utility situation has involved every other institution in the country, the banks, the insurance companies, and even the educational institutions. Read the record.
>
> They have canvassed the textbooks used in the schools in every State in the Union, according to this record. They have reported upon the textbooks used in teaching your children economics. Wherever they have found in these textbooks statements that were hostile to their interests, they have gone to the school board, so they say, and have insisted that the objectionable statements be eliminated. In some cases they have asked that the textbook be eliminated entirely. And they say that they have been very successful. This is the Government record.
> They have gone so far as to enter into agreements with publishers of textbooks for the schools to the effect that these publishers will not bring out a text book on economics until they have first submitted the text to the power companies themselves, so as to be sure that the text books are safe and sane and dependable. This peril has invaded our banking system, our insurance system, our investment system, as well as other institutions, until it has imperiled every institution of a free people and democracy.

This, it appears to me, leads to only one conclusion. We must first provide as the Rayburn-Wheeler bill does for the gradual elimination of this octopus called the holding company. Our second step must be the continuation of such projects as Muscle Shoals, Boulder Canyon, Grand Coulee, Bonneville, Casper-Alcova, Fort Peek, North Platte, and Columbus until we have located over the country enough Federal owned and operated generating plants to supply to publicly owned distributing systems electric light and power sufficient to meet the needs of the entire country.

The advantage of the elimination of the control of the holding company is in my opinion enough to make this a part of any first or must program.

It might be well now to list some of the advantages of public ownership of public utilities. In doing this, I refer to an address delivered by Carl D. Thompson, secretary of the Public Ownership League of America:

1. It requires less capital to establish a public service than it does a private one. The average value per kilowatt of generating capacity for the municipally owned plants is $180, while that for the private plants is $339.

2. A city can borrow money more cheaply than a private company.

3. A municipal plant always amortizes or pays off its capital account. In this way it gradually lessens the interest and principal payment each year until finally, at the end of 20 or 25 years, they are eliminated entirely. Private companies do not pay off their capital account. From two-thirds to as high as four-fifths of the cost of electric current can be saved by municipal ownership by this one means alone of amortizing the capital account and thus eliminating the capital charge.

4. Municipal ownership avoids the evils and dangers of overcapitalization. By manipulating stocks and bonds, by issuing fictitious securities, by mergers and combinations, by capitalizing earnings and the increasing value of land, by refusing to eliminate dead capital, and other similar devices, and last, and most subtle of all, by the device of the holding company the private owners of public utilities have heaped upon their properties enormous charges. The Federal Trade Commission has found over $925,000,000 of watered stocks, inflation, or fictitious values in the capital account of the electric utility corporations of the United States.

5. Municipal plants invariably reduce rates in a community as soon as they are established. A municipal plant which is generally established in competition with a private plant invariably compels a private plant to reduce its rates.

6. Private companies unduly favor large consumers at the expense of the small consumers, although the latter constitute by far the greater part of the public.

7. The city secures complete control of rates and service. For a commission of three men to consider all of the several thousands of utility cases in a State and do justice to all is a physical impossibility, even assuming that the commissioners are absolutely honest, fair, and impartial. Moreover, no city can afford the expense of hiring an army of high-priced attorneys, public-utility experts, and engineers and keeping them through interminable hearings to meet the forces which these powerful corporations have permanently employed. But what makes the hope of any relief or protection from this source utterly groundless and delusive is the fact that even if the cities are in rare instances successful before the commissions the companies appeal to the courts. There the commission's rulings are promptly overridden. And no matter how solemn a contract a city may have with a company affecting rates or service, the courts do not hesitate to set it aside, if it can be shown to their satisfaction that the rates are "confiscatory."

8. Public ownership lowers the cost of public service.

9. A municipal light and power plant is a moneymaker. Municipal plants by the hundreds, everywhere, all over the country are paying for themselves, paying interest charges, paying off the funds borrowed to start them, and, besides, many of them are paying for their extensions and improvements out of earnings and contributing to other public expenses that actually reduce tax burdens.

It is often asked, "Do municipal light plants pay?" This question was answered in a report of the Commonwealth Club of San Francisco, as it pertains to the municipal plants of California.

It was found that after paying all operating expenses, depreciation on the investment, interest on debt, and all items of expense except taxes that the private companies pay, the cities made the following net profits annually:

City	Population	Net profit
		Percent
Pasadena	76,086	47
Redding	4,188	46
Anaheim	10,995	46
Glendale [1]	62,736	45
Lodi	6,788	38
Healdsburg	2,296	37
Alameda [1]	35,033	35
Riverside [1]	29,696	35
Palo Alto [1]	13,652	34
Roseville	6,425	32
Santa Clara	6,302	28
Los Angeles [2]	1,238,048	28

[1] City owns distribution system only. [2] Competitive plant.

It is further reported that the savings in lower rates to the citizens amounts to an average of over 10 times the amount lost through taxes.

Twenty-one California cities now own their electric distribution systems.

10. The smallest city can make it succeed.

11. A municipal light and power plant would mean a better lighted city.

12. A municipal electric light and power plant means better homes in the community.

13. A municipal plant means better and more business for the local businessmen. The power companies are everywhere entering the merchandising field, selling all kinds of electrical equipment, fixtures, and attachments at prices below cost and making up the loss by charging high rates for electric service.

14. With low electric light and power rates, industries can develop and multiply; new ones can be drawn to the city.

15. A municipal light and power plant helps the community by making it easy and natural to coordinate the public services.

16. If the city owns its own municipal light and power plant, the earnings stay at home and thus go to the building of the local community.

17. A municipally owned light and power plant enables the city to secure the advantages of interconnection and cooperation with other cities.

18. It substitutes the principle of public service for that of private profit.

19. A private corporation operating a public utility is constantly at variance with the community.

20. Municipal ownership puts the private corporations out of politics.

21. Since the whole life, progress, and prosperity of the community is dependent upon electric service, the city and its people must choose whether they are to own it or be owned by it.

22. We are confronted with the possibility of a complete and Nation-wide monopoly of the power resources of the continent.

Senator NORRIS, speaking on this subject in 1925, said:

> I have been dumbfounded and amazed, and the country will be dumbfounded and amazed when it learns that practically everything in the electrical world is controlled either directly or indirectly by some part of this gigantic trust. It controls from one end of the country to the other the generation and distribution of electricity by water power and by other means and the manufacture and sale of electrical appliances, running all the way from a little electric bulb in the house lamp to the gigantic generator that will handle without trembling from 30,000 to 60,000 horsepower. A gigantic trust that has fastened its fangs upon the people of the United States from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the Great Lakes to the Gulf.

Now, I want to sum up. We are looking for economic security on a decent-living standard. This seemingly cannot be achieved if we insist upon retaining all of our inherited concepts. One of these concepts that must go is the one about private property in the public-utility field. Control is no longer as one with ownership. This results in irresponsible control. This results in what the President termed "theft within the law." Ownership and control, then, must be vested once more in the people.

When this part of our economic problem is solved we can turn to others.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Speaker, on last Monday evening in the city of Springfield, Ill., there appeared the irresistible and distinguished Congressman from New York, Mr. HAMILTON FISH, for the purpose of making an address to the Young Republican Club of that city. The Illinois State Register, which is the official organ of the national administration in the down-State part of Illinois, reported that the gentleman from New York harangued the multitude and pawed the air for 2 solid hours discussing the current questions of the hour, and particularly condemning and criticizing the new-deal policies of the President of the United States, as the gentleman from New York has frequently done upon the floor of this House.

Mr. Speaker, there is a Republican club in Cook County, Ill., and which, I am informed, has branches throughout the State, which has for its purpose chiefly "To rescue the Republican Party of Cook County, Ill., from the profanation and control of the hoodlums and those who have exploited the party for their selfish interests and to restore it to the keeping of God-fearing men and women who have kept the faith and who follow in the footsteps of Lincoln and the fathers."

The article I previously referred to did not state which one of the Republican branches the distinguished gentleman from New York addressed in Illinois, but knowing him as I do, I am certain he addressed those who want to follow in the footsteps of Lincoln.

My colleagues, there is something strange about Springfield. It has a fascination and an attraction for those who have the Presidential bee in their bonnet, and when one goes to that great city of patriotism and hospitality, the city where Lincoln loved and lived and is buried, he immediately finds himself enmeshed in surroundings which breathe dignity and power. He finds himself surrounded by flowers, photographers, and a deep mental inspiration, the result being that his chest expands, and he becomes imbued with an idea that he was probably sent for the purpose of performing some political miracle, and that it is up to him to do something worth while for his country. In that Lincolnian atmosphere we find the scholarly gentleman from New York mingling with his fellow Republicans, condemning and criticizing the new deal from every angle. Yes, Mr. Speaker, condemning and criticizing the new deal from every angle, but failing to make a single constructive suggestion as a substitute to any of the new-deal policies which are now in active operation and are proving themselves to be a tremendous assistance to mankind in this economic storm through which we are drifting.

Mr. Speaker, there are countless others in the past who, assuming they were Republican Presidential timber, have gone to the shrine of Lincoln for hope and courage. Around that inn of immortality young Republican candidates for the highest office within the gift of the people have lingered, and if they stay long enough—and most of them do—they become inspired with the feeling that they were sent to that section of the country by some superpower to obtain from the dead Lincoln a spiritual decree which will authorize and direct them to go forth under the open skies of America and save the Republic.

And so today we find the delightful Congressman from the Empire State out in the Middle West, feeling the pulse of the people to determine whether or not they will draft him to be the Presidential nominee in 1936.

Mr. Speaker, I admire the courage of this fighting Congressman in starting his Presidential campaign in the State of Illinois, in view of the fact that it was only last November when the voters of that great State elected every man running for a State office by a plurality approximating some 300,000 votes. It was that election which sent, in a Statewide fight, two distinguished sons of Illinois as Congressmen at large to this great body, and who are now actively participating in the affairs of Government on the Democratic side, namely, the Honorable MARTIN A. BRENNAN, of Bloomington, and the Honorable MICHAEL L. IGOE, of Chicago.

And then again, I must commend the courage and the fortitude of the distinguished gentleman from New York when I think of his starting his campaign in Illinois right on the heels of the greatest political upheaval in the history of America. It was only a week ago last Tuesday that the Chicago voters went to the polls and gave to that fine and splendid executive, the Honorable Edward J. Kelly, the greatest plurality for mayor that any individual ever received in any city election during our entire history. His majority over all opponents was 543,853.

The election of the entire State ticket last November, and the election of the greatest mayor that Chicago has ever had, on April 2, is a barometer as to what is going to happen to the Republicans in the Nation in 1936. I sincerely hope that the Republican Party in convention assembled will see fit to place Congressman FISH at the head of the ticket to lead their cause in the next Presidential election. And if that happens, I make the prophecy now that the great humanitarian in the White House, who will be the Presidential nominee in 1936, will carry the State of Illinois by not less than 500,000 votes. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Speaker, I object.

TWO SIDES OF THE T. V. A.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, this move by the T. V. A. to extend its activities into the Cumberland and Tombigbee Valleys is a typical example of the activity of bureaucracy to promote its own growth. A year and a half ago we set up the T. V. A. to be a yardstick for use in determining fair rates for power companies. Here they are now asking to be increased to a 50-foot chain. Not only is the T. V. A. seeking to promote its own growth, but it is reaching out to secure for itself unprecedented powers. Ever since the foundation of this Nation, the Congress has been the only branch of the Government having the power to acquire or dispose of property. Now comes this Board of the T. V. A. demanding that it be vested with this power. When is the Congress of the United States going to take drastic steps to curb the growing power of bureaucracy? Bureaus are born, but never die. Their voracious appetite for public funds increases, even faster than their growth.

As a measure to promote national defense, by making nitrates available for munitions in time of war and for fertilizers in time of peace, the T. V. A. was justified. It is justified also as a yardstick for utility rates, providing its calculations are honestly arrived at and justly applied. When they attempt, however, to socialize industry by soliciting various industries to move into this section of the country because of potential cheap power rates, that is a different matter. No doubt such a movement would result in a favorable development of this section, but to the detriment of other sections. It is undoubtedly robbing Peter to pay Paul. Any opposition to any extension of either the scope or authority of the T. V. A. on these grounds is certainly unjustified. We cannot solve our problems of unemployment by shifting them from one section to another. We can only intensify them by such methods. We must approach them from a national, not a sectional viewpoint.

As to the proposal to slack the Tennessee River in order to facilitate river transportation as far as Knoxville, Tenn., the benefits of such a proposition are very doubtful to say the least. The manganese in that region is of too low grade to be used in competition with manganese from regions where it is of much higher grade. As for the coal fields to be opened, we already have twice as many coal mines opened as we can normally support. Why subject an already overdeveloped industry to further competition? One of our major problems of unemployment is to provide employment for our bituminous-coal miners. Those who might be placed in emplyment by the opening of this coal field have land upon which to raise their living. That is more than the miners in most other sections have. Why take any of our population now living from the soil from that soil? We are now face to face with the necessity of returning a large part of our population to the soil in order to enable them to exist, if we would but face conditions honestly.

As to flood control and the rehabilitation of eroded lands, it does not seem reasonable that those who for years and years have permitted severe soil erosion because they would not avail themselves of cover crops and proper methods of tillage will avail themselves of more intricate methods to bring their lands back to a productive basis.

From the latest testimony on the matter, it seems that entirely too little attention is being paid to one of the primary reasons for the establishment of the T. V. A.—national defense. We have the right to expect it to be devoted to this purpose—a punitive agent to the enemies of this Nation in event of an emergency.

On the other hand, it is amusing to hear the representatives of the power companies protesting to high heaven because the activities of the T. V. A. have forced them to sell some of their holdings to the T. V. A. Since when has big business become so considerate of the rights of competition? Are these power companies at the present time not endeavoring to drive from business all competition in the field of producing and selling electrical devices? Who has pursued methods more ruthless in stifling competition than the industrial captains of the past? They should be reminded that "he who comes before a court of equity should come with clean hands."

In many of the States the utility companies and similar interests entered into politics and secured control, body and soul, of State senators, legislators, Governors, and public-service corporations or like administrative bodies. By such means they secured legal sanction to finance themselves in highly irregular manners and charge excessive rates to consumers. They had no compunctions against issuing watered stocks or like practices which were certainly detrimental to the public interest. They seek to secure sympathy now by citing the amount of their stock owned by widows and orphans. By their ruthless and irregular methods of business in the past they have provoked a storm of protest from an outraged public and are fearful of the consequences.

There are two sides to this question as in all others. At all hazards governmental ownership must not be extended to the point where it will crush private business. Just the same, I believe the value of the T. V. A. as a yardstick will be proven by future developments. Even so, I do not believe we can afford to allow it to develop unchecked or to extend its domain any farther.

SOCIAL-SECURITY BILL

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7620) to provide for the general welfare by establishing a system of Federal old-age benefits, and by enabling the several States to make more adequate provision for aged persons, dependent and crippled children, maternal and child welfare, public health, and the administration of their unemployment-compensation laws; to establish a Social Security Board; to raise revenue; and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7260, with Mr. MCREYNOLDS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may need and I would appreciate being notified when I have consumed 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I admire the lack of courage of the majority. There are two very apparent reasons why there has been quite a lapse of time since the Ways and Means Committee reported the social security bill.

First, it was necessary to receive instruction from the White House; and second, the majority were endeavoring to see whether they could muster votes enough to pass the bill under a gag rule. Having come to the conclusion that it was impossible to do this, it was decided to handle this "hot potato" under an open rule and take their chances on mustering enough votes to put the bill across in something like the form that the committee has reported.

They have taken the right course, but for the wrong reason. This bill contains such vital issues that it should be thoroughly and completely discussed, and, I hope, very materially amended, before it reaches a final vote.

LITTLE TESTIMONY FROM PRACTICAL PEOPLE

In his lengthy explanation of the measure yesterday, our distinguished chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina, stated that the Ways and Means Committee had given most careful consideration to this bill and that ample opportunity had been given to everyone to appear in opposition to this bill that desired to do so. Theoretically, that statement is correct; practically, it is not.

While this measure has been before Congress since the middle of January, and more than a thousand pages of testimony have been taken, I want to call attention to the fact that there was little testimony from persons of experience in business lines. Practically everybody who appeared had some part in drafting the legislation or was consulted with respect to the problems involved. There were not to exceed a half dozen persons who testified who were not a part of the present new-deal administration.

REVISED DRAFT NOT PUBLIC UNTIL AFTER APRIL 4

While the bill was being revamped, and while it was under consideration in the form in which it is now presented, the bill was not made public. Every copy issued to the members of the committee was marked "confidential", and the interested parties all over the country had no knowledge whatsoever of the contents of the present measure before it was introduced on April 4.

Moreover, it is such a complicated bill, containing so many different titles and different ideas, that the average citizen would have much more difficulty in understanding it than we Congressmen, who have had it before us.

OBJECTIONABLE TITLES SHOULD BE GIVEN ADDITIONAL CONSIDERATION

Such a departure from present-day policies as is contained in the objectionable titles of the bill should be given the greatest opportunity for study, analysis, and criticism. To say that hearings were held and witnesses did not appear is no argument that the country is for this measure in toto.

The only fair way that old-age annuities and unemployment insurance should be made policies of the Federal Government is after a disinterested commission, composed not only of college professors, members of the "brain trust", and "new dealers", but of people of experience and judgment, has studied such problems for an indefinite period and reached conclusions which could be recommended to the Congress.

I can hear my Democratic colleagues say that the Advisory Board set up by the President's committee was composed partly of such people as I have described. This Board might be regarded as qualified to study the problem, but their services were confined to very short periods and very little consultation. No report from them was submitted to the Ways and Means Committee. There is no evidence as to their attitude toward this measure, nor do we know whether they ever saw the revised bill.

THIS IS PERMANENT, NOT EMERGENCY, LEGISLATION

I cannot emphasize too strongly that very meager and insufficient study has been made of this proposed legislation, under which the Federal Government is to embark upon new and untried policies.

All recommendations of the present administration have been based upon so-called "emergencies", and the legislation has been of a temporary nature, either to be operated for a specified time or canceled in the discretion of the President.

An important part of the legislation contained in this bill is not only new and untried in this country, but haste is urged in the adoption of permanent policies. One of the men principally responsible for the preparation of the bill reiterated several times before the Ways and Means Committee that we should hasten this legislation through in order that it could be submitted to State legislatures before they adjourned this spring. Fortunately, many of these legislatures have already adjourned, and I hope they will adjourn several times more before this hastily and ill-conceived and apparently unconstitutional legislation becomes the permanent policy of the Federal Government.

NO COMPROMISE IN PRESENT BILL

There are two outstanding features in any legislative enactment: First, the possibility of compromise in order that views may finally reach a harmonious conclusion; and, second, the scale of merit.

The first one is not found in H. R. 7260. There is no compromise in it of any kind. The principles laid down in the bill correspond with the original suggestions contained in the report of the President's Committee on Economic Security, which indicates that the majority members of the Ways and Means Committee are entirely subservient to the instructions of the administration.

We therefore look to the second feature for a decision for or against the measure.

DEMERITS OF BILL OUTWEIGH MERITS

I feel that I have been fairly diligent in my attendance at the hearings and executive sessions of the committee, which have run over a period of several months on this measure alone.

It has been my firm effort to become convinced of the merits of the bill, and I have approached the several subjects with an open mind. However, I have come to the conclusion that the demerits of the measure far outweigh the merits.

SHOULD HAVE BEEN FOUR SEPARATE BILLS

If legislation of this character is to be passed by Congress, there should have been 4 separate bills instead of 1, divided into 2 categories: First, those which, according to the views of the minority of the committee, "spring from the desire of the Federal Government to provide economic assistance to those who need and deserve it"; and, second, those which are based upon the principles of compulsory insurance.

FAVOR OLD-AGE PENSIONS, AID TO CHILDREN, ETC.

In the first class are titles I, IV, V, and VI, granting aid to the States for old-age pensions, for the care of dependent children, for maternal and child welfare, and for public health. They carry with them an appropriation for each of the various purposes, which will aggregate less than $100,000,000 the first year. I am in favor of all of these titles.

OPPOSED TO OTHER TITLES

The other group consists of titles II and VIII, relating to compulsory contributory annuities, and titles III and IX, relating to unemployment insurance. I am opposed to these four titles of the bill. They are not in any sense emergency measures. They would not become effective in time to help present economic conditions, but, on the contrary, would be a definite drag on recovery.

FAVOR INCREASE IN FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION FOR OLD-AGE PENSIONS

Title I of the bill provides for Federal cooperation with the States in establishing and maintaining State old-age pension systems. This cooperation is extended in the form of a grant to the States of one-half the amount expended by them for pensions for the aged, with a limitation on the Federal contribution of $15 per month per person.

Of the 28 States which now have old-age pension laws, none has a rate in excess of $1 per day or $30 per month. If they continue the $30 rate, the Federal Government will relieve them of one-half the cost, or they can increase the rate to $45 without any new burden on the State Treasury.

With the Federal Government contributing not more than $15, the tendency will be to freeze the rate at not more than $30. I cannot bring myself to believe that a $30 pension is adequate, particularly in cities, where rents and other living costs are much higher than in rural areas.

If it is to be the policy of the Federal Government to cooperate with the States along this line, I would favor a substantial increase in the Federal contribution for the purpose of meeting the conditions described in section 1, namely, assuring "a reasonable subsistence compatible with decency and health to aged individuals without such subsistence."

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Titles III and IX of the bill seek to coerce the States into enacting laws for the payment of unemployment compensation. This coercion takes two forms.

Under title III the Federal Government agrees to grant to the States the sum of $4,000,000 in the fiscal year 1936 and $49,000,000 annually thereafter for the purpose of meeting the cost of administering their unemployment-insurance systems, if, as, and when set up. Only one State—Wisconsin—now has such a system in actual operation. The States cannot qualify for this Federal assistance unless their laws meet certain Federal standards of administration laid down in the bill.

The money appropriated is expected to be offset by the incidental revenue obtained from the tax under title IX. Titles III and IX are separated in the bill for constitutional reasons.

DIRECT COERCION ON STATES UNDER TITLE IX

The coercion under title IX, in the guise of a tax, is more direct. Employers of 10 or more persons are required, beginning next year, to pay a Federal tax on their pay roll, but are permitted to offset against this tax, up to 90 percent thereof, any contributions made by such employers to State unemployment-insurance funds.

If the employer's State has no unemployment-insurance law, he gets no credit, but must pay the Federal tax in full. His employees, however, get no unemployment benefits, since the receipts from the tax are simply covered into the general revenues of the Government. Thus, employers will have the burden of a pay-roll tax whether their State has an unemployment-insurance law or not, and they can escape the major portion of the Federal tax only by prevailing upon their State legislature to enact such a law. In effect, title IX forces employers to pay a tax either to the Federal Government or to the State.

RATES OF TAX AND TAX BURDEN

The rate of tax under title IX would be 1 percent in 1936, 2 percent in 1937, and 3 percent in 1938 and subsequent years.

The burden which it would impose on business and industry is estimated by the committee at $228,000,000 in the first year, $500,000,000 in the second year, and from $800,000,000 to $900,000,000 annually thereafter.

TAX WOULD INCREASE UNEMPLOYMENT AND WOULD BE BURDEN ON BUSINESS

At this point I want to say that I have approached the subject of unemployment insurance with an open mind. I believe in it in principle, and favor its ultimate enactment under State laws. However, I cannot support titles III and IX of the present bill, because I am convinced that instead of contributing to the relief of the unemployment problem they would aggravate it. This would result in the following manner:

First, by putting the penalty on pay rolls the tax under title IX would admittedly have the effect of increasing unemployment.

Second, by imposing a tremendous additional burden on industry and business the tax would seriously retard business recovery.

Moreover, there is a constitutional question involved, since the tax under title IX is not a true tax, but a legislative "club" to force State action along certain lines.

EMPLOYERS WILL REDUCE NUMBER OF EMPLOYEES TO ESCAPE OR MINIMIZE TAX

That the tax will increase unemployment should be rather obvious. In the first place, employers of less than 10 persons are exempted. The natural tendency for employers of slightly more than 10 persons will be to reduce the number below that figure and thereby escape all tax. If, for example, 11 or 12 persons are employed, the tax must be paid on the pay roll of all, but if only 9 are employed, no tax whatever is imposed.

The bill, therefore, offers a direct invitation to reduce the number of employees in a business to nine or less wherever that is possible. At the same time it offers an inducement to larger employers to get along with as little help as possible in order to minimize the pay-roll tax. It is quite apparent, therefore, that, although the tax is in the long run supposed to be of benefit to the unemployed, it actually will increase their ranks.

NO IMMEDIATE BENEFITS TO UNEMPLOYED

I might point out that even if the States promptly enact unemployment-insurance laws no benefits could be paid to the unemployed until after a reserve has been built up, and this, of course, would take several years. Even then benefits would be paid for only a few weeks, after a certain waiting period, and with the present number of unemployed the funds would soon be exhausted.

In this connection I cite the following language in the report of the majority, page 7:

> It should be clearly understood that State unemployment compensation plans made possible by this bill cannot take care of the present problem of unemployment.

With respect to the payment of unemployment relief in the future, the report adds:

> Unemployment insurance cannot give complete and unlimited compensation to all who are unemployed. * * * It can give compensation only for a limited period and for a percentage of the wage loss.

These statements in the committee's report make clear the fact that this is not in any sense emergency legislation which requires immediate enactment. No quick relief is intended. Hence there is no object in leaving titles III and IX in the bill, particularly when their result will be to increase unemployment rather than relieve it.

So far as the burden of the tax on industry is concerned, I will discuss that more in detail in connection with the tax under title VIII, relating to compulsory contributory annuities.

INOPPORTUNE TIME FOR ENACTMENT

To summarize my position on the subject of unemployment insurance, I may say that while I am in complete sympathy with its general purpose, I do not believe that the present is an opportune time to put it into effect, nor do I believe that the method adopted by the bill is the best or only method for dealing with the problem.

COMPULSORY CONTRIBUTORY ANNUITIES

I am strongly opposed to the provisions of titles II and VIII, which impose upon private industry a compulsory Federal retirement system for superannuated employees and exact a contribution from such employees and their employers, in the guise of a pay-roll tax, to set up reserves out of which to pay retirement benefits.

PLAN IS UNCONSTITUTIONAL

The Federal Government has no express or inherent power under the Constitution to set up such a scheme as is proposed. No one knows this any better than the administration and the Democratic majority of the committee. They have been working for months trying to give titles II and VIII some color of constitutionality. They are not very proud of their handiwork, but they think it is in the least objectionable form from the constitutional standpoint.

TITLES II AND VIII INTEGRAL PARTS OF SINGLE SCHEME

Titles II and VIII are just as closely related as a house and its foundation. The former provides for the compulsory premiums; the latter for the benefits. The two titles go together and neither one is intended to stand by itself.

The reason that these two titles are separated in the bill is that if they were combined, as they should be, they would on their face be unconstitutional, since the Federal Government cannot lay a tax for any other purpose than the raising of revenue for public uses. The tax imposed under title VIII is not a tax at all, but an enforced insurance premium for old-age annuities. The money raised by the tax is not intended for the support of the Government, but to pay the benefits provided under title II to the same employees who are taxed under title VIII. If you will look at the exemptions from the tax under section 811 (b), you will see that they are identical with the exemptions from the benefits under section 210 (b).

MAJORITY REPORT ATTEMPTS TO DECEIVE SUPREME COURT

The report of the majority makes no reference to the connection between titles II and VIII, because they know that the Supreme Court is eventually going to look at that report to see what the intention of Congress was in setting up these titles. They purposely omitted any reference to the connection between the two, because they wanted to try to delude the Supreme Court. I do not think the Court is going to be deceived, however. It is not going to let Congress do in a back-handed way what it cannot do directly.

REAL PURPOSE STATED IN PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE

On page 5 of the report of the majority the inference is left that title II is a Federal benefit system assuring support for the aged "as a right rather than as public charity." This is outright deception. The report also states that title II establishes a "system of old-age benefits, paid out of the Federal Treasury." That, again, is outright deception. Nothing of the kind is contemplated. The real purpose of titles II and VIII is stated in the President's message of January 17, 1935, in which he said that the object of these provisions was to set up a system of "compulsory contributory annuities", which in time would establish a "self-supporting system for those now young and for future generations."

CONSTITUTION SHOULD EITHER BE ABOLISHED OR RESPECTED

Personally, I think this attempt to delude the Supreme Court is rather childish. Either the Federal Government has the power to set up this compulsory-insurance system or it has not. The Constitution should either be respected or abolished. What is the sense of having it if we are going to spend most of our time trying to devise ways and means to circumvent it?

SCOPE OF TAX CHANGED FOR CONSTITUTIONAL REASONS

Under the original bill nonmanual workers earning more than $3,000 per annum were exempted from the tax, and hence from the benefits, but in order to make the tax provisions, standing by themselves, less obnoxious from a constitutional standpoint, the tax was made applicable to the first $3,000 of the annual wages of all employees regardless of the total salary. Thus, while it was not the intention of the original bill that this higher-salaried class of employees be covered, they were included for constitutional reasons.

Obviously, an alleged tax applying to low-paid employees and not to higher paid ones would arouse suspicion on the face of it. I am afraid that the changes made by the majority still has not removed this suspicion, because it appears rather strange for a tax to apply to the entire salary of a worker earning $2,500 annually, but to only the first $3,000 of the salary of a corporation officer receiving, for example, $100,000 annually.

Usually, we have found that the person drawing a high salary or receiving a large income is the one whom an effort has been made to penalize by taxation. There is a distinct objection where the small-salaried man pays a tax on his whole income and the higher-salaried man gets almost complete exemption.

This again is a reversal of existing policy, in allowing a man of large salary or large income to escape tax on a large portion of his income while his less fortunate neighbor must pay a tax on his entire salary. We have frequently heard references made to socialistic tendencies and the creation of sentiment favorable to socialism. I know of nothing that will be more repugnant to the average wage earner than to think "I am to pay tax on my whole salary while the big fellow pays tax on only a part of his."

When this scheme of taxation becomes known, look out for storm signals.

PRINCIPAL OBJECTION IS BURDEN THE TAX PLACES ON BUSINESS

I know that it is useless to call the attention of Congress to the constitutional limitations on its powers. The administration is not going to play the legislative game according to the rules.

I therefore wish to say that my principal objection to titles II and VIII lies in the tremendous burden which they would impose upon employers and employees.

RATES OF TAX AND TAX BURDEN

Titles VIII imposes a pay-roll tax on employers, regardless of the number of persons in their employ, at rates ranging from 1 percent in the 3-year period from 1937 to 1939, inclusive, to a maximum of 3 percent after January 1, 1949. This tax is imposed on the first $3,000 of the annual wage paid to each employee.

Title VIII also imposes a gross income tax on the first $3,000 of the annual wage of the employee, which is deducted by the employer from the employee's wage envelope and turned over to the Federal Government. The rate is the same as that imposed on the employer, beginning with 1 percent on January 1, 1937, and increasing at the end of each 3-year period until the maximum of 3 percent is reached in 1949.

The additional burden on industry and business by virtue of the tax on their pay roll ranges from $280,000,000, in 1937, to over $900,000,000 in 1950.

A further $280,000,000 to $900,000,000 is annually withdrawn from the wages of employees, and hence from the channels of trade.

TOTAL PAY-ROLL TAXES REACH $2,700,000,000 IN 1950

Considering the pay-roll taxes under titles VIII and IX together, industry and business are faced with an additional tax burden of $228,000,000 in 1936, $800,000,000 in 1937, $1,000,000,000 in 1938, and gradually increasing amounts in future years, reaching $1,800,000,000 in 1950. This would be in addition to income, property, and other forms of existing taxes.

The latter figure does not include the $900,000,000 annual tax on employees, which increases the total burden to $2,700,000,000.

TAX MUST BE PAID EVEN IF BUSINESS IS IN THE RED

It should be remembered that the taxes imposed under titles VIII and IX will be collected from businesses operating in the red as well as those fortunate enough to make a profit, and they will have to be paid even if the Government has to take over the business in satisfaction of them.

PAY-ROLL TAXES WOULD PREVENT POSSIBILITY OF RECOVERY

In my opinion, the proposed imposition of the pay-roll taxes imposed under titles VIII and IX constitutes the greatest single threat to recovery of all the administration's ill-advised policies. Business and industry are already operating under very heavy burdens. Many businesses at the present time are barely able to keep their heads above the water, and if they have to face a pay-roll tax for retirement annuities, and another pay-roll tax for unemployment insurance, eventually aggregating 6 percent, they probably will be unable to continue in operation. This means more unemployment, and more uncertainty.

Aside from these taxes, the country is faced with additional income and excise taxes to pay interest upon and ultimately retire the ever-mounting national debt. Where the tax burden will end, nobody knows, and with business trying its level best to stage a recovery amid all sorts of difficulties, restrictions, and impediments, it is not going to help conditions any by putting additional millstones around its neck.

BUSINESS WILL ALSO FEEL EFFECT OF REDUCED PURCHASING POWER OF EMPLOYEES

Not only is business going to be affected by the direct burden imposed upon it, but it is going to feel the effect of having the purchasing power of employed persons reduced by from $280,000,000 to $900,000,000 annually. The administration seems to be so much interested in putting purchasing power into the hands of the masses, but here is a measure which will considerably reduce the already existing purchasing power of some 22,000,000 workers.

Mr. BOLTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. BOLTON. Do I understand that the annuity tax, or the unemployment tax, goes into effect in 1937?

Mr. TREADWAY. The unemployment tax affects your pay rolls of 1936, collected in 1937.

Mr. BOLTON. Paid in 1937?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. BOLTON. That is the reason for the date being put off to 1937 instead of 1936.

Mr. TREADWAY. I think there is a little policy involved with respect to the date, when it goes into effect, and I think the gentleman comprehends what that is.

Mr. BOLTON. Yes.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. RICH. This is going to exact a total tax on industry a 9-percent tax bill?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes; 6 percent on the employer and 3 percent on the employee.

Mr. RICH. Then would it not be a good idea to call this a 9-percent tax bill?

Mr. TREADWAY. That would not be in accordance with the intentions of the proposers of this measure. They want to hoodwink the public and the country into thinking this is a great emergency bill, when it will not be effective for several years.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts has consumed 30 minutes of his time.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Has the gentleman from Massachusetts heard any member of the majority on the Ways and Means Committee claim that this is an emergency bill? Has it not been the contention all the while that this is permanent legislation?

Mr. TREADWAY. I called attention to the fact that this is the most important piece of legislation introduced by the present administration, because all our previous enactments have been emergency legislation, whereas this is a piece of permanent legislation, which strikes me as very foolish.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. And it purports to be permanent legislation.

Mr. TREADWAY. Of course, I absolve the majority of the Ways and Means Committee of ever having represented it as an emergency measure except to this extent: Your chief advocate, to whom I have already referred, wanted to hurry us in the consideration of the most important problem I have ever known to come before the Congress in peace times in order, forsooth, to push it through the State legislatures and get this coercive proposition working quickly. Fortunately we were able to keep that down.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Is the gentleman disappointed because the Ways and Means Committee provided plenty of time for ample consideration?

Mr. TREADWAY. I do not consider they gave plenty of time when we consider that this is a permanent policy that you are setting up here, upsetting all business conditions, changing methods of doing business, inaugurating a new scheme of a permanent character. I consider that such a measure cannot be given sufficient study in 3 months' time and have it digested by the people. The members of my own committee realize this. I am one of them, and I will acknowledge that I cannot answer many questions that can be asked today about it; and as much as I respect the mentality of the leaders on the majority side, I doubt whether they can answer many questions that can arise here.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Is the gentleman from Massachusetts opposed to the bill?

Mr. TREADWAY. I shall vote most strenuously in opposition to the bill at each and every opportunity I get. Does that answer the gentleman's inquiry?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Yes; it does answer the inquiry; but I have a few comments to make a little later on about it.

Mr. TREADWAY. All right; but do not qualify my objection to the bad features of the bill offsetting its good features. You have plenty of window dressing in here and I am going to refer to that.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to my native Berkshire friend.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The gentleman stated that there would be a tax placed on business now in the red.

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. When the sales tax of 3 percent was brought up in the Seventy-second Congress it worked the same way, and did not the gentleman favor it?

Mr. TREADWAY. I am certainly, today, in favor of a sales tax that is fair to everybody, but this tax is a special rather than a general one.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. That tax would have affected all business that was in the red?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes; it probably would; but that does not answer the question involved in this proposition. Here is a tax on pay rolls. You do not make any point in that comparison, Brother FITZPATRICK. A sales tax materially differs from anything in this bill. I would be glad to argue the difference if time permitted.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Is it not a fact that this House turned down the sales tax?

Mr. TREADWAY. It did; and I am sorry it did.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Is not a pay-roll tax just as vicious as a sales tax?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes; because this is a specialized vicious tax.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman from Massachusetts has made a strong argument against title 2 and title 8.

Mr. TREADWAY. I do not think the gentleman from Kentucky agrees with me.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I wondered if it was prepared after the conference held by your Republican friends.

Mr. TREADWAY. No, sir; I have been prepared to go along with the members of the committee if they had stricken out the bad features of the bill. I did not have to wait for the President to return to get instructions from the White House as to how I stood on the bill. The Committee on Rules could not act until after they heard from the White House as to a gag rule.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. When the bill was under consideration—and I am not betraying any confidence of the committee, as it has been carried in the press—the gentleman from Massachusetts and his Republican brethren were not as strong in opposition to titles II and IX as at present.

Mr. TREADWAY. But we are not the proposers of the legislation. You men that propose such vicious legislation will take the blame. We will sit by on the side lines and see you operate this great measure. We only have 7 votes against your 18 votes. We know what a minority is. We sat there waiting for the emissary to come from the White House and tell you what was to go in the bill and what was not. I know what a minority is. I have been a Member of the majority as well as of the minority. We never got such instructions when we were in the majority and I hope we never will when we get in the majority again.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Let me say that, as far as I know, as the chairman of this committee, after the original bill was framed, that not one single word, either directly or indirectly, came from the White House or anyone representing the White House, as to what we should do with the bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. I am sorry the gentleman is so ignorant as to the procedure of the Ways and Means Committee. I did not suppose he would admit such ignorance as to what transpired in that committee.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Let me say to my good friend that I am not so ignorant that I cannot tell the truth. [Laughter.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Any time I fail to tell the truth I wish the gentleman would remind me of it.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I would be reminding the gentleman a good deal of the time. [Laughter.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Every time I make an argument contrary to the ideas of my distinguished friend the chairman of the committee, he says some harsh things, but he does not mean it, and we shake hands after it is all over.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. KENNEY. To ask the gentleman whether he proposed any plan at all for an old-age pension?

Mr. TREADWAY. What a foolish, ridiculous question. What earthly good would it do for us to propose a plan when you Democrats deprived us of three votes on the Committee on Ways and Means. The gentleman should not ask foolish questions; he had better talk about his lottery. That would be much better.

Mr. KENNEY. Perhaps it was foolish to expect a different answer from the opposition, but I compliment the gentleman from Massachusetts for his contribution to my plan for a national lottery.

Mr. TREADWAY. Oh, the gentleman should talk about his favorite pastime.

Mr. KENNEY. Yes; I shall do so during the present emergencies, and credit is due the gentleman for mentioning it, because it was the lottery that put the gentleman's State on its feet, and a lottery conducted by the Government for public benefit, in my opinion, is not gambling.

Mr. TREADWAY. No State ought to expect to pay its bills through gambling devices.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. TABER. Does the gentleman attach any significance to the fact that the Chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, in answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts in reference to the White House suggestion, stated that no "constructive" suggestion came from there?

Mr. TREADWAY. If the gentleman used that word, I think that qualified him.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I will have to continue, if I may.

PAY-ROLL TAXES WILL DECREASE PURCHASING POWER OF THE MASSES BY INCREASING COST OF LIVING

The pay-roll taxes on industry will indirectly decrease the purchasing power of the public generally by adding enormously to the cost of living.

This form of tax, like the turn-over tax, will be applicable to every process of production and distribution and will be pyramided from one stage to another.

PAY-ROLL TAX FOR ANNUITIES ALSO PUTS PENALTY ON EMPLOYMENT

In discussing the pay-roll tax imposed under title IX, relating to unemployment insurance, I pointed out how it would have the effect of increasing unemployment by putting a penalty on employment. The same effect will be produced by the pay-roll tax under title VIII. Here, again, the tendency will be for employers to get along with as little help as possible in order to minimize the tax. This is another respect in which the pay-roll taxes tend to hinder recovery.

BILL GIVES NO RECOGNITION TO PRIVATE PENSION SYSTEMS

One further reason for my opposition to the compulsory annuity provisions of the bill is that they give no recognition whatever to the old-age retirement systems set up by individual employers. This means that these private systems cannot be continued, even though in most instances they provide more liberal benefits than are contemplated by the bill.

PROBLEM OF RESERVES

There is one feature of the compulsory annuity provisions to which I wish to call attention that is generally overlooked. I refer to the matter of reserves.

According to the report of the committee, the reserve for the payment of retirement benefits will reach a maximum of about $32,000,000,000. That is more than the present national debt.

In his statement before the Ways and Means Committee, the Secretary of the Treasury, in referring to this matter, said:

> It should be emphasized that the Federal Government, by inaugurating a national contributory old-age annuity system, is undertaking responsibilities of the first magnitude. Not only is it committed to paying a 3-percent return upon all collections in excess of current benefit payments involved, but it is also diverting for the purpose of old-age security a very large fraction of its possible tax revenues.

I do not very often agree with the remarks of the distinguished Secretary of the Treasury, but I do agree most fully with that statement that we are "undertaking responsibilities of the first magnitude." I suggest that gentlemen read that statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, and consider the underlying thought involved in it. He says we are not only undertaking responsibilities of the first magnitude, but that we are diverting for the purpose of old-age securities a very large fraction of possible tax revenues. There is a great deal of real meat in that.

Mr. PERKINS. And when the reserves reach $32,000,000,000, how are they to be invested?

Mr. TREADWAY. I am coming to that.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Oh, I must yield to my old competitor and opponent always. He always has words of wisdom to expound.

Mr. HARLAN. I just noticed that this reserve of $32,000,000,000 would not be reached until 1970.

Mr. TREADWAY. Then why store it over in the Treasury vaults, any more than silver and gold that the country is buying up so liberally?

Mr. HARLAN. The gentleman's statement was that our debt could not be reduced until the Republicans get in power.

Mr. TREADWAY. That is correct.

Mr. HARLAN. And I have just merely thought that 1970 would be about the time when that would happen. [Laughter.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Oh, we will take a chance of reducing it before that time with our party in control.

This statement of the chief financial officer of the Government should have careful and thoughtful consideration. It is quite apparent that the establishment of this contributory annuity system is going to have consequences which are little dreamed of in connection with its broader purpose. Yet these consequences are likely to be such that they should not be overlooked.

GOVERNMENT COMMITTED TO PAYMENT OF 3-PERCENT INTEREST ON RESERVE FUNDS

The fact that the Government is committed to the payment of 3-percent interest on the annuity reserve simply means that this country is faced with a permanent national debt of $32,000,000,000 on that account. Even if the present national debt should be retired—and that could only happen when the Republicans are returned to power—even if our debt should be retired, our taxpayers would still have to pay nearly a billion dollars a year in interest on the annuity reserve.

RESERVE IS INVITATION FOR GOVERNMENTAL EXTRAVAGANCE

What would be the consequence of having $32,000,000,000 of credit standing in the name of the National Government? Would it not be an invitation for all sorts of pork-barrel schemes and wild-spending sprees? We would have such an orgy of extravagance that even the unprecedented expenditures of the Roosevelt administration would seem small in comparison.

The report of the majority states that this reserve could be used to retire outstanding tax-exempt securities, but I wish to point out that the securities would still be tax-exempt when held by the Government.

Not only is there a large reserve account in connection with retirement annuities but under the provisions of section 904, all State unemployment-insurance funds must be paid into the Federal Treasury and held in trust by the Secretary. The Federal Government is committed to the payment of interest on this fund, which in time may reach large amounts. The existence of this second trust fund aggravates the evils in connection with the annuity trust fund.

It not only is evident that we are taking out of industry a very large annuity and unemployment fund but we are starting a dangerous policy when we commit the Government to paying interest on trust funds held for the States. This interest must be paid whether the Government has any use for the money or not, and the provisions of section 904 of the bill simply add another burden on the American taxpayer. Moreover, it is a burden which they are not essentially under any obligation to bear.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. The gentleman pointed out that industries or concerns employing 10 or more people would finally be subject to a 9-percent tax.

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes; including the tax on employees. The tax under title IX only applies to employers of 10 or more, but the tax under title VIII applies regardless of the total number.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I would like to hear the gentleman's views on how that will affect those who employ less than 10, for instance 9, who pay no tax.

Mr. TREADWAY. I think I have explained my position on that. A man employing just at that margin, 11 or 12 or 13, will discharge a number so as not to have to pay any tax under title IX.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. If there is a 9-percent differential between those who employ less than 10 and those who employ 10 or more, what effect will that have?

Mr. TREADWAY. Title IX will give the small employer an advantage over the larger employer.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Is there anything in the bill to obviate that situation?

Mr. TREADWAY. No.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I think there may be some misunderstanding as between the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION] with reference to the 9 percent. As I understand it, all of the 9 percent does not apply in the same category with these 10 people.

Mr. TREADWAY. No.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Six in one group and three in the other.

Mr. TREADWAY. Six percent applies under title VIII, to employers and employees, and 3 percent applies under title IX, to employers of 10 or more.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. The 3 percent applies on those who employ 10 or more?

Mr. TREADWAY. That is true of the tax imposed by title IX. The tax under title VIII has no such exemption.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Just one other question, if you please. The railroads of the country have set up a pension organization. Congress has authorized that, and it is now before the Supreme Court with regard to many other industries. Is there any way to reconcile that, to help those who have already got a system that they prefer to this?

Mr. TREADWAY. On the contrary, the question of private annuities was discussed very fully in the committee. I am breaking no confidence when I say that the majority, which of course has written this bill, would not show any consideration for the corporations that have their own systems of pensions. The gentleman does not blame our side for this composition which I hold in my hand, of course.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. What will become of the tremendous sum that the workers in years past have put into these various annuity funds?

Mr. TREADWAY. There are two features, as I understand it. The first proposition is, they could liquidate, if it was an agreement between the employer and the employee. The other proposition is that if large corporations have insured their employees through an insurance company, those policies could be canceled.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. But there are contracts. How do you get rid of those contracts?

Mr. TREADWAY. I hope I made it plain that I am not defending that proposition whatever. I am only trying to explain it a little bit.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Does this bill propose to do away with or destroy all those contracts that have been entered into?

Mr. TREADWAY. In effect; yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I am sure the gentleman from Kentucky will be able to give his colleague better support for the bill than I have been able to.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I am simply seeking information.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I wanted to speak about that, because the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] has caused the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION] to have an erroneous impression as to the tax upon concerns employing 10 or more and those employing less than 10. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS] is correct in pointing out that the tax on employers of 10 or more falls in one category. That is a 3-percent tax for unemployment compensation, but, after all, the employing of 10 or more does not affect the tax that is collected under title VIII. Old-age benefits will be paid employees regardless of the number employed.

Mr. TREADWAY. Would the gentleman mind giving his explanation in his own time and let me conclude my remarks?

Mr. Chairman, I do not care to yield in order to have speeches made in my time. When I have concluded, I will then be glad to leave the field open, as far as I am concerned.

I yield now to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. From the gentleman's address, I take it for granted he is really in favor of an old-age pension?

Mr. TREADWAY. I am in favor of title I, which is the old-age pension, whereby the Government will pay to States and pay it out and out, from general taxation. Title I does not set up a new taxing scheme. I am opposed to new taxes.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. I believe an adequate old-age pension would wipe out of existence the abominable poorhouses of the Nation.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I have very great respect for the gentleman from Massachusetts, and I always listen with great interest to whatever he has to say, even though I do not always agree with him. I understand the gentleman is in favor of an old-age pension?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. ASHBROOK. And that the gentleman is of the opinion that the amount prescribed in this bill is not sufficient?

Mr. TREADWAY. No. I think I would like to see it raised a little, but you will notice the word "little."

Mr. ASHBROOK. The question I wish to propound to the gentleman is what he would favor? How much of a pension would the gentleman favor? What is the maximum pension he would favor?

Mr. TREADWAY. Well, that is a leading question. I admit it is a very fair question, but it is a difficult one to answer. I would refer the gentleman to the clause in the bill, which I think is well stated. Some of the gentlemen wanted an indefinite amount. Others realize that if we go too high we may add to this debt; but let me call the attention of the gentleman to the clause which I read in my remarks in section 1 of the bill:

> For the purpose of enabling each State to furnish financial assistance assuring, as far as practical under the conditions in such State, a reasonable subsistence compatible with decency and health to aged individuals without such subsistence there is hereby authorized to be appropriated—

And so forth.

I think that is as close as I would like to go at this time.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Would something like $50 a month be about right?

Mr. TREADWAY. Oh, I do not think we ought to get into a discussion of figures at all. Of course, it varies. It must vary in various places. I referred to that, and so does the report of the committee. The expense of taking care of these aged people must vary in different communities with different fundamental expenses such as rent, heat, and light.

Mr. ASHBROOK. But it would have to apply to all States alike, would it not?

Mr. TREADWAY. The Federal Government, by the contributory system under the bill, can contribute different amounts up to $15, which the States must match. That is the provision of the bill. Under this bill, if a State was to have a law under which it put up a contribution of $25, the Government would only be called upon to match $15 of that, making a total of $40 for the person affected.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I wish to say that I still have the same high regard for the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. TREADWAY. It is reciprocal, because we have served together many years. I think it is fortunate that our colleague returned to our fold after so many years' absence, which, of course, was detrimental to the welfare of the Nation, not having him as a Member of this House.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I sincerely thank my distinguished old-time friend.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, how much more time have I remaining of my hour?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 2 minutes remaining.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield for a brief question.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Is there anything in this bill to take care of the present 15,000,000 unemployed?

Mr. TREADWAY. I should say absolutely not. The system cannot be set up inside of 5 years, and it will probably take a longer time.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Has it not been held out to these 15,000,000 unemployed that this bill would take care of them? It is mere camouflage.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman does not belong, as I understand it, to either major party. He is not criticizing the minority; but he is passing out an awful indictment against the majority who are responsible for the bill that is now before us which contains, as the gentleman from Minnesota well says, a very distinct camouflage; and that is expressing it very mildly.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. PERKINS. I am still curious to know how the $32,000,000,000 of reserve is to be invested.

Mr. TREADWAY. I said I was coming to that. Perhaps I did not make that clear. There are provisions in the bill giving the Secretary of the Treasury authority to issue special bonds. One provision is in section 904 of the bill, on page 51. Another is in section 201.

Section 904 is of sufficient interest and importance that I shall take the time to read it. It is a very unique provision. I never saw it before in any legislation, but they are going to have so much money they will need special bonds to invest it in. I read:

> (b) It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to invest such portion of the fund as is not, in his judgment, required to meet current withdrawals. Such investment may be made only in interest-bearing obligations of the United States or in obligations guaranteed as to both principal and interest by the United States. For such purpose such obligations may be acquired (1) on original issue at par, or (2) by purchase of outstanding obligations at the market price.

This is the interesting part, and I think it answers the question of the gentleman. This is found at line 20 of page 51:

> The purposes for which obligations of the United States may be issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, are hereby extended to authorize the issuance at par of special obligations exclusively to the fund. Such special obligations shall bear interest at a rate equal to the average rate of interest, computed as of the end of the calendar month next preceding the date of such issue, borne by all interest-bearing obligations of the United States then forming part of the public debt.

In other words, if this section passes muster here, it extends authority under the Second Liberty Bond Act to authorize the issuance at par of special obligations exclusively to the fund.

Section 201 also relates to the investment of reserve funds by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. PERKINS. That means the fund may be invested in Liberty Loan bonds?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes; or a special bond.

Mr. PERKINS. How are they going to invest $32,000,000,000?

Mr. TREADWAY. I think the authors of the bill on the other side will be obliged to answer that question.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Would the gentleman mind waiting until I have concluded?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I wanted to call attention to the fact that the gentleman from Massachusetts was reading about the unemployment trust fund, and did not touch top, side, or bottom of the question of the gentleman from New Jersey, who was inquiring about the reserve account for the payment of old-age benefits.

Mr. TREADWAY. Then tell the gentleman where it is.

Mr. PERKINS. Perhaps the gentleman from Kentucky can tell us where they will invest the money.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I shall be very happy to if the gentleman from Massachusetts will yield me 2 or 3 minutes.

Mr. TREADWAY. I am near the end of my remarks. I know the wisdom of the gentleman from Kentucky can await the conclusion of my remarks before he answers the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. At least I will not refer to the wrong section of the bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the superior wisdom on this bill of the gentleman from Kentucky. I do not claim to know much about the bill, but I do not think either he or his colleagues in the House will know much more about it after they get through describing it either. [Laughter.]

CONCLUSION

At this point I repeat that while I am favorable to the humanitarian provisions of the bill making appropriations for aid to the States in providing for old-age pensions, in caring for dependent children, in providing for maternal and child welfare, and in extending public-health services, the other provisions of the bill are, to my mind, so objectionable that I feel obliged to vote against the bill in its entirety if they are retained.

At the proper time I propose to move to strike out the provisions relating to unemployment insurance and compulsory annuities, and if that motion should prevail, I would welcome the opportunity to vote in favor of the remainder of the bill.

BILL WINDOW DRESSED TO CATCH VOTES

Of course, the only reason so many worthy provisions are incorporated in the bill is to catch more votes and make it politically inexpedient to vote against it. I have come to the conclusion, however, that political expediency should be cast aside in favor of calm judgment, and the merits of the bill weighed against the demerits.

Although I would like to vote for the titles I have indicated, I cannot vote for the bill on final passage if I have to take with it other provisions which I deem obnoxious, at least so far as action at this time is concerned.

OBJECTIONABLE FEATURES ARE NOT EMERGENCY

As I have pointed out, the provisions to which I object are in no sense emergency measures. They are not intended for the relief of present economic conditions, but commit the Federal Government to a permanent program of social legislation. Since no form of quick relief is involved, there is all the more reason for considering each proposal separately on its own merits.

A VOTE FOR PAY-ROLL TAXES IS VOTE TO CONTINUE DEPRESSION INDEFINITELY

In closing, I want to emphasize again that the tax provisions of titles VIII and IX place upon business and industry and the employees therein a permanent future burden of $2,700,000,000 annually—a sum equal to the entire internal-revenue receipts of the Federal Government in the last fiscal year.

For the reasons I have stated, it is my firm opinion that as long as the pay-roll taxes are a part of the bill a vote in favor of the bill is a vote to prolong the depression indefinitely.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HILL].

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat confused as to the position my friend from Massachusetts and his colleagues of the minority on the Ways and Means Committee are taking with reference to this bill. In the first place, the gentleman from Massachusetts expressed himself in the early consideration of the bill as being afraid it would be hurried through and passed out of the committee with such promptness that we would not have time to give it proper consideration. When he discovered that the committee was going into every line and provision of the bill and did, in fact, devote about 2½ months to an intensive study and consideration of the measure, he seemed to be disappointed because his first fears were not realized.

He expresses certain objections to the measure, but I take it that the principal objection he has voiced is based upon what he says is the fact, namely, that it is not an emergency measure and does not take care of the present unemployment situation. No one has ever contended that this is an emergency measure. In fact, the contrary has been asserted time and time again; but I am sure the Members of the House will recall that we have, only recently, passed through Congress what was known as the "Public Works Act", which was and is an emergency measure and which was designed to meet the present situation of unemployment by placing in the hands of the President the means to project public works and to put men to work. That bill did not come before the Ways and Means Committee because it was an appropriation bill. It was not included in this bill because it was not within the jurisdiction of our committee, but it was passed by the Congress, and my friend from Massachusetts and others on his side of the aisle were strenuously objecting to that measure, which was an emergency measure. So I say it is difficult to know how we are to proceed in order to please our friend from Massachusetts.

I have before me the statement of the minority views on the present bill, and in view of what the gentleman from Massachusetts has said in his address just delivered, I hardly know how to construe the statement in these minority views. They are signed by the seven minority members of the Ways and Means Committee. They say in the first part of the statement that the bill separates itself into several titles, which readily and naturally segregate themselves into two categories.

They say that all of the titles other than titles 2 and 3 and the two tax titles that go along with them are perfectly satisfactory to the minority. They engage in some discussion of these titles, but further down in the statement we find this language:

> However, we favor the principle of unemployment insurance. These titles of the bill aid those States who desire to establish such insurance, and therefore we resolve all doubts in favor of this legislation.

Just what do the gentlemen on the other side mean by that expression in light of the statements made by the gentleman from Massachusetts in his address delivered this morning? They emphasize the fact further in the statement that their opposition to those two titles is based upon the fact that this is not emergency legislation, and state:

> And we also oppose these titles because they would not in any way contribute to the relief of present economic conditions, and might in fact retard economic recovery.

Mr. Chairman, that is not a statement of outright opposition to this legislation. So I was at a loss to understand, and I asked the gentleman from Massachusetts whether he would vote against this bill. He assured me that he intends to do so. I regret very much, in view of the fine cooperation which the Members on the Republican side of the committee gave us in considering the bill, that he cannot go along with us on the final passage of the measure; but if that is his attitude, of course, we will labor along without his support.

No one contends that this legislation is a cure-all. One of the objections that the gentleman made was that title 3, which is the unemployment-compensation title, does not give full and complete insurance against unemployment. Of course, it does not, and no one has contended that it does. However, we do contend that with that title enacted and after reserves have been built up, it will furnish a fund for the maintenance of those who find themselves unemployed for temporary periods, so that in minor depressions, at least, they may be tided over until they can secure reemployment, and in most instances such fund will tide them over until they can get back their old job or can find a new job.

That is all unemployment insurance purports to do. If the gentleman from Massachusetts is looking for full and complete insurance so that full wages will go along for an indefinite period of time, then I think he might consult with the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LUNDEEN], who has a bill here which proposes to pay to every unemployed person over the age of 18 years the full amount of his wages, so long as he is unemployed, and if he is only part-time employed to make up the difference between the full-time wage and his part-time wage. The lowest calculation of the cost of that kind of legislation to the Government, the lowest estimate that you can possibly put upon it, according to the figures given by witnesses who appeared before our committee, is $10,400,000,000 a year. I wonder if the gentleman from Massachusetts favors that kind of legislation, the kind that calls for an impossible burden of taxation? That is the purport of his argument here.

Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman is in favor of the principle of unemployment insurance, what is wrong with title III of this bill? What kind of a provision can be brought in that would be more reasonable and more bearable as a tax burden than the provision which is in this bill as title III? We appreciate the fact that the character of this legislation is new. You may call it, in fact, revolutionary in comparison with other legislation which this Congress has been called upon to enact, but we are going through strenuous times which have taught us lessons that we must heed. These trying times have pointed out situations ahead of us that we must recognize and meet.

Mr. Chairman, this legislation is forward looking. It means to take care of the future and create conditions in the future operation of the industry and economics of this country that will absorb some of the shock of these panics and depressions; at least tend to stabilize industry and employment and carry the country along over the rough spots until conditions may be righted. The Members of this Congress should be progressive enough in their thoughts and ideas to recognize these conditions and have the courage to meet them. I submit that we are making a step in the right direction in the enactment of this legislation.

Mr. Chairman, I know that it is probably difficult for the Members generally to find the time to study this bill closely and to understand every detail of this legislation. That is no reflection on anyone. I want to confess it is difficult for the members of the Ways and Means Committee, who have studied it for weeks and weeks, to get the full purport and understanding of all its provisions and ramifications. We have done our best to bring in a bill worthy of your consideration and support.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. Does the gentleman think a Member should vote for a bill that he does not understand?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. That is a question for the Member himself to decide. I have an idea that many of us have done that time and time again. I am not recommending it, nor am I advising against it.

Mr. Chairman, titles 2 and 3 are the two titles which are the pet aversions of the gentleman from Massachusetts. Title 2 provides benefits to a certain class of employed people after they have arrived at the age of 65. The benefits are measured by the total wages which they earn over their working period from and after December 31, 1936, until they reach 65. If they have a total amount of wages of sufficient amount, they will be able to support themselves on the benefits without having to resort to the charity of old-age pensions. Certainly that is a commendable thing. If one of these employees at the age of 65 has earned wages over a period of at least 5 years of not less than $2,000, he will be entitled to a monthly payment from the Government of $10. Of course, that is not enough to support him, but you have the old-age pension; and if he is needy, he will be able to get additional support from that source. If he has total wages of $3,000, he will get a monthly payment of $15, plus a certain percentage of increase as the amount of wage rises above $3,000. It is graduated upward, measured by the total amount of wages received, to the point where it is possible for one of these employees to receive as much as $85 a month, but not more than that.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. The old-age pension is fixed at the age of 65. I find in the mining sections the big trouble is they will not employ men in the mines who are 45 years of age or over.

What is there in this bill that will take care of them; and, assuming that a lot of them cannot get back to work, what is there in this bill, either of old-age pension or employment annuities or insurance, that will take care of the something like 13,000,000 workers between the ages of 45 and 65?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The unemployment-compensation title is the only one that might reach them.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. But if they are now past the age to get work and cannot get work, what is there for that group?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. It will not carry them indefinitely. It will certainly not do that.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Would it carry them at all unless they get work?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. It would carry them for some weeks at something less than their average wage, but it does not take care of them completely. There is nothing in this bill, under the old-age assistance feature or under the old-age benefit provision, that would take care of a man in that situation.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Was there any suggestion or any plan submitted to the committee that would take care of this great army of people between 45 and 65 that are now out of employment because of their age?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I do not recall any witness who appeared before our committee advocating what we would term an "old-age pension" on an age limit as low as that.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. In seeking further information, may I suggest that, as the gentleman knows, these men between 45 and 60, who cannot get employment, have families and are sending their children to school. They cannot get work. What is to become of this great army of people in this country?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I am not so sure that men 45 years and over, under normal conditions, cannot get work. I appreciate the fact that at this time many people who have not even reached the age of 45 are out of employment and the part of the program that meets that situation now is the Public Works Act.

The purpose of that act is to give present employment and try to stimulate private enterprise and private industry so that they will get on their feet and also give employment to these unemployed men.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. But the mining concerns and others for some years past have been drawing the age limit at 45, and the United States Government draws the limit at 50 years. There is no work for them to get.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that this bill, through the old-age benefits or old-age pensions, does not meet that situation.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I was concerned to know if there was any plan that would reach it.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Only the administration of the Public Works Act.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Does this bill provide any relief for the unemployed farmer?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. This bill does not.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. The farmers are not considered at all?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. This bill does not take up that feature at all. The Public Works Act is the one that furnishes employment. It is designed to furnish employment to anyone who is employable—farmers, industrial workers, or others.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. The work-relief bill?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Yes.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. As the gentleman across the aisle said a moment ago, suppose a person between the ages of 45 and 65 is unable to obtain a position; will he be considered? In other words, is it absolutely essential that he must pay into the Government in order to obtain unemployment insurance?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. We are not putting any tax on the employee at all.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. I want to make the point absolutely clear. Is it essential, in other words, that the man or woman must be employed in order to obtain employment insurance?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. He must be employed and lose his job in order to get this unemployment-insurance benefit.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Suppose they are unable to obtain jobs, how will they be taken care of?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. It does not operate, so far as he is concerned, until he does get a job and loses it.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Maybe the gentleman can clear up another point I have in mind. As a member of the Committee on Labor, we held a number of hearings last year on the 6-hour day, 5-day-week bill, and practically every man who appeared before our committee in opposition to the bill was the head of some large industry, and I made it a point to ask them this question: Do you have an age limit? And practically every one said yes; that the age limit was around 40 or 45. Unless our Government sees to it that employment can be obtained for men and women between the ages of 45 and 65, I do not see how they are going to be benefited under this bill.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Of course, you have to assume they will not be able to get employment at that age. It is possible that a lot of people at that age or over may find themselves out of employment, but there is no age limit on a man going out and getting a job. When, however, he gets to the age where he may be presumed not physically able to work, he will come under the provisions of the bill. You must draw some arbitrary age line and take care of them within those limitations.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. But it is true, is it not, that many of the industries in the United States, as well as the municipal governments, the State governments, and the Federal Government, have an age limit?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I appreciate the fact that after a man gets to be 45 years of age he is handicapped in competing with younger men in getting jobs. We all know that.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield.

Mr. WOOD. In connection with the question of my colleague the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DUNN], it is my opinion that this is a social-security bill and that this bill is not designed to cure all the evils of society.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The gentleman is correct in that statement.

Mr. WOOD. Is it not a fact that if this bill is enacted it will take care of three or four million aged people, and it will also take care of other millions of unemployed in purchasing power, and thereby lower the labor market; that the labor market will become such under the operation of the law that there will be less demand for labor, and that many men today that cannot get a job between the ages of 40 and 50 will be employed?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The gentleman has stated the matter clearly, and I thank him for the contribution.

Now, there is another feature that I want to touch upon. I am not going to explain all the titles, but the gentleman from Massachusetts was asked where the provision in the bill is that would authorize the investment by the Secretary of the Treasury of funds that would take up a considerable portion of the outstanding Government bonds.

The gentleman from Massachusetts referred to a section in title IX, under the unemployment tax feature. The real answer to the question is found on page 8 of the bill, subdivision (d), section 201, reading as follows:

> It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to invest such portion of the amount credited to the account as is not, in his judgment, required to meet current payments. Such investment shall be made in any interest-bearing obligations of the United States or in any obligations guaranteed as to both principal and interest by the United States. The Secretary of the Treasury may at any time sell any such obligations. The interest on and the proceeds from the sale of any such obligations shall be credited to the account.

The account that is referred to is the "old-age reserve account" under title II appearing on page 7 of the bill, section 201 (a). That is the reserve account to which allocations and appropriations are made to meet the obligations under title II dealing with old-age benefits.

It was brought to your attention by the gentleman from Massachusetts that in 1970 the amount of reserve in that account would be $32,000,000,000 plus—that it would gradually go up to that amount.

Then you have in addition to this fund, which by the provisions of the bill it is made the duty of the Secretary to invest in Government bonds and guaranteed bonds by the Government, the other provisions in title IX, to which the gentleman from Massachusetts referred, being the moneys that are to be used, trust-fund money of the States placed in the custody of the Secretary of the Treasury, to be paid out on the requisition of the States to take care of unemployment insurance. In the course of time that fund also would be absorbed into this investment in outstanding Government bonds about which you hear so much complaint as being tax exempt.

These bonds will be called in. They will be placed in these reserves as the Government's investment of the funds, and you will then have this great volume of outstanding tax-exempt bonds in the hands of the Government so that the people who now have their money invested in those tax exempts would not be so fortunate in the matter of investments that would relieve them from payment of income taxes.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. With these humanitarian impulses under this bill I am in full accord, but I want to know whether it is true that it is expected ultimately to set up a reserve of $32,000,000,000.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The reserve is set up with the effective date of this bill, and into that reserve fund will be paid such amount of moneys that are actuarily determined by the Treasury Department and for which estimates are made to Congress by the Bureau of the Budget, as shall be necessary to meet the obligations on the funds under the provisions of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 15 minutes more.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the fund ultimately become approximately $32,000,000,000?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. That is the estimate of the actuaries.

Mr. PERKINS. And that fund will be invested in Government bonds?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. It will be, provided there are enough bonds to take it up. If there are not, there is provision that the Secretary of the Treasury issue special obligations that are nontransferable, nonassignable, so as to carry the investment. The obligation is on the Treasury to keep the fund invested, and if it does not keep it invested, except so much as is necessary for current expenses, it would be chargeable with the interest on it just the same.

Mr. PERKINS. The Government debt would have to be $32,000,000,000 to keep the fund going.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Probably.

Mr. PERKINS. And it would have the beneficial effect of wiping out persons now exempt from taxes by reason of tax-exempt securities.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Yes.

Mr. SIROVICH. And it would force that money into trade and help industry and commerce in that respect.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Yes; where income taxes could be collected.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Yes.

Mr. MAY. And instead of remaining frozen, it would be liquid. I want to know what difference there is in the principle involved in the mechanics of this bill in setting up these reserves, and the practice now indulged in by substantial insurance companies in connection with the issuance of old-age annuities.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I take it there is a close parallel. The reserve is built up on the actuarial estimates such as those upon which insurance funds are built, only this probably is much larger than any individual insurance fund.

Mr. Chairman, title II of the bill is the biggest thing in the bill. It is the most important thing in it, and when you are striking at title II, you are striking at the keystone of the arch, which supports the social-security program of the administration. It is the biggest thing in the bill, and probably that is why my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] is leveling his fire upon that one particular section.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Yes.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. The gentleman may have discussed this proposition, but the gentleman does not maintain, does he, that title II is necessary, that we must have title II in order to have old-age pensions?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Certainly not. And it is not necessary to have unemployment compensation, but it is necessary to have both of them if you are to have a rounded-out program of social security.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Many people think, and I am one of them, that old-age pensions is the primary subject in this bill. I think the country is more interested in old-age pensions than in all the rest of the bill. The gentleman takes the position that title II is the heart of the bill, but I maintain that it is not.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. And probably the country is not so familiar with this subject as with the old-age pension proposition, and probably that is why the people are not giving greater attention to old-age benefits.

Mr. DOUGHTON. And is it not a fact, if title II is stricken from the bill, and title I is left in the bill, that this burden will grow so rapidly and so enormously that it will be an unbearable burden on the taxpayers of the country generally in a few years.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. That is true.

Mr. DOUGHTON. And if we do not prepare for setting aside these reserves for old-age pensions, if we depend upon the Federal Treasury for old-age pensions, and the extent to which it will grow, how does the gentleman think a tax would be raised to finance it?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. The chairman indicates that he directs that question to me. If in these days of depression we assume to pay an old-age pension throughout this country, and make it practically compulsory, and can do so, then I say it is not necessary for us to run forward and borrow a whole lot of trouble 50 years from now.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Oh, these old-age annuities will come before any 20 years or 50 years or even 10 years.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. This old-age benefit title, title II, is designed specifically to make men as nearly self-supporting in their old days as is possible, by giving them this opportunity for thrift, to lay up something that will bring them in an annuity in their old days.

On the question of what it would cost under the provisions of this bill for the old-age pension alone, as I recall the figures, at the present rate fixed in the bill it would, in the course of a generation or so, be costing the Government $1,800,000,000 or $1,900,000,000 a year for the old-age pensions alone, whereas if we have this provision that is self-supporting, we reduce that to $500,000,000.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield.

Mr. MAY. I was wondering if title II was not designed by the committee for the principal purpose of gradually eliminating some of the direct old-age pensions, as the annuity fund increases.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. That is true.

Mr. MAY. And that in the end it will help to reduce, rather than enlarge the responsibility of the Government for old-age pensions.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. That is true. Of course, it will take a long term of years, but this is a long forward-view proposition.

Mr. MAY. I imagine the gentleman and his committee have figured out some period of years, long in advance when it would reach the apex, and level up that situation.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Yes. Of course, it does not take care of all the aged. They are not all included. Probably not over half of them are included, but it will take care of that great class, the workers, along about 1965 or 1970. It will put them on practically a self-supporting basis.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield.

Mr. MAPES. I should like to ask the gentleman a question about the unemployment-insurance provision. This may be an old question to the gentleman and the members of the Ways and Means Committee, but this thought has occurred to me. Employers are given a credit of 90 percent on the Federal tax if they pay a similar tax to the States. As I understand it, there is no unemployment insurance paid to anyone, unless the States pass legislation providing for it in their respective States.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. That is true.

Mr. MAPES. Is it the gentleman's idea that the States will attempt to meet the cost of the unemployment insurance by a State tax, or that all of the money to take care of the unemployment insurance in the different States will be collected by the Federal Government, and that the Federal Government will then turn over sufficient funds to the individual States to meet the cost of administering their State laws?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The Federal Government turns over no money at all to the States under the unemployment compensation title. This bill would levy a 3-percent tax upon the employer, based upon his pay roll. That is a 3-percent tax on all employers throughout the United States.

Mr. MAPES. How is that collected?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Through the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in the ordinary way of tax collection.

Mr. MAPES. Then why does the gentleman say the Federal Government will not turn any money over to the States?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. That is exactly the situation. They paid that money into the Treasury, and all the money that comes to the Federal collector from that tax goes into the Federal Treasury. I think I can explain what the gentleman has in mind. An employer who pays this tax or is charged with it, in order to get credit against the tax must have contributed to the State-unemployment fund, which is levied, of course, by the State, and he will be entitled to a credit up to 90 percent of his 3-percent Federal tax, if he has paid that much into the State.

Mr. MAPES. The particular point I had in mind was this, that inasmuch as the employers would be credited for only 90 percent of the Federal tax no matter how much they paid to the State, there would not be any State legislation as far as the tax is concerned, because the employers in all of the States would object to the State legislation inasmuch as they would have to pay 10 percent, at least, of the Federal tax.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The employer, of course, pays that tax, and the 10 percent which the Federal Government takes in any event, and that is the least it will get, goes into the Federal Treasury, but it is provided that the Federal Government shall contribute to the cost of State administration of its unemployment compensation act. I did not speak quite correctly when I said the Federal Government would not pay the States any money. It does provide that out of that 10 percent in the Federal Treasury there shall be paid to the States the amounts estimated to be necessary to pay the administration cost of the unemployment compensation act.

Mr. MAPES. Is it the gentleman's thought that the States will levy a tax on their own account, or will they look entirely to the funds collected by the Federal Government for the amount necessary to meet their unemployment insurance?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. There is no such provision in this bill. The Federal Government does not pay any unemployment compensation at all.

Mr. MAPES. I understand that, but it seems to me that all the States, as soon as they can get to it, will pass legislation which will provide for unemployment insurance.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I think that is true. That is the hope.

Mr. MAPES. The question in my mind is this: Does the gentleman and the other members of the Ways and Means Committee think that in that case provision will be made for raising sufficient funds to pay the insurance, or will the States all look to the Federal Government to raise the money? It seems to me that the tendency of the employers in every State will be to resist legislation which will require the money to be raised under the State laws, because of this differential of 10 percent in the amount they have to pay.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I hardly think that result will follow. As I say, this 10 percent is kept for administration purposes, largely. In any event, there is not any doubt as to the Federal Government having authority to levy this excise tax upon the employers.

It is in this bill now. If it becomes a law, they will have to pay that tax if they are going to get any benefit from stabilizing their employment and stabilizing their own industries. It is to their interest to have State compensation laws whereby they can get a credit up to 90 percent of this Federal tax. Unquestionably the inducement will be for them to urge rather than to resist State legislation establishing unemployment compensation acts.

Mr. MAPES. It seems to me, up to the point where the tax is provided, that that will be the urge; but if that State can get this unemployment insurance without levying any tax on its own employers, it seems to me it will take this course.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. They cannot get it. That is just the rub; they cannot get it.

Mr. MAPES. Is it not left entirely to the discretion of this board which is created as to whether or not it will accept the legislation of the State in that respect?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. There are certain requirements set out here that must be provided in State legislation. When these requirements have been incorporated in any State plan, the board will approve the plan.

Mr. MAPES. I wondered if the witnesses before the gentleman's committee and the members of the committee had reached any judgment as to what the tendency in that respect would be.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Let me explain the situation to the gentleman from Michigan in this way: In the first place, why is it necessary to levy a 3-percent Federal tax? Why not just leave this whole thing to the States individually and let the Federal Government stay out of it? This is the reason why the Federal Government is levying this tax: If the State of Michigan, for instance, wanted to enact a State unemployment compensation act, very likely part of the burden would be thrown upon the industry of that State and part of the rest of it would be thrown upon the employees; but the burden would fall upon the industry of the State very largely.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. It is to keep down unfair competion between the industries of different States.

Mr. MAPES. I understand that feature, but there is this differential of 10 percent which the employer will have to pay extra over the State law if the State law provides a tax. If the State law is passed without any provision for a tax, then the State can get all the money from the Federal Government that is necessary.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The State probably will get most of it, because it will take practically all this 10 percent to pay the cost of administration throughout the various States.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Let us assume that I have a $100,000 pay roll, and I send in to the State my certified check for $3,000 covering 3 percent; must I then send an additional $300 check to the Federal Treasury, in that in making out my return I show a liability for $3,000, my $2,700 credit, which is 90 percent, and then there remains $300 for the Federal Treasury.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. That is right.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Thus costing me in all $3,300 instead of $3,000?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Not necessarily that. They might put the State tax down to 2.7 instead of 3.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Then I would receive credit for only 90 percent of the $2,700?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. No; the gentleman would get credit up to 90 percent of the Federal tax. If you paid more than 3 percent you could not get credit for more than 90 percent of the Federal tax, but if you paid just exactly 90 percent of the Federal tax to your State, you would get credit for the State tax.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I might pay 90 percent of the tax assessed by the State rather than the tax which I had paid to the State.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I do not know whether I quite follow the gentleman or not. Let me put it in a different way. The Federal tax is 3 percent. Whatever you pay to the State you will get credit for up to 90 percent of that 3 percent.

Mr. CRAWFORD. There is no way they can charge me in total for both State and Federal taxes in excess of 3 percent of my pay roll?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Yes; the State could put a 4-percent tax on you if it wanted to, but you would get credit for only 2.7 of the 3-percent Federal tax. This is a matter of State administration. In fact, all these titles except title II are administered by the States.

Mr. SIROVICH. And, if the gentleman will yield, it puts all States on a parity.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Yes; that is the point. This 3 percent keeps down discrimination and competition.

Mr. SIROVICH. Exactly.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. As between States having and not having unemployment compensation acts.

Mr. McGROARTY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield that I may ask one question to relieve my own mind and conscience?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield.

Mr. McGROARTY. The gentleman stated that this bill was very difficult to understand. I find it so, and I want his advice to me as a colleague. The bill has just come into my hands and into the hands of the Members of the House. I understand I have 20 hours in which to study it before I must cast my vote on it. With my little brain, that time is not sufficient.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I am sure the gentleman is entirely too modest.

Mr. McGROARTY. Would the gentleman advise me to vote for the bill—I belong on this side of the House—without understanding it?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I am not the gentleman's mentor, and I must decline to advise him. I recommend the bill to him, however. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON].

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I am heart and soul with the aims of this legislation. To me there is nothing more tragic than dependent old age, and dependent crippled and neglected children. I am extremely sorry that I cannot go along with the majority in this instance, because they have worked long and diligently on the measure that is now before the House. It is a definite improvement over the original bill which was presented to the Ways and Means Committee nearly 3 months ago. I had much hesitancy in submitting a minority report because, due to illness, I was not able to regularly attend committee meetings while the measure was under consideration, but nevertheless I followed the committee's work closely.

I shall endeavor to set out as briefly as possible my objections to this economic security bill in its present form.

The measure is divided into nine substantive titles, as follows:

Title I, providing a Federal grant in aid to meet one-half the cost of State old-age pensions for persons of 65 years of age or over who are in need.

Titles II and VIII, relating to old-age annuities for certain classes of workers, and imposing a pay-roll tax on employers and employees to meet the cost thereof.

Titles III and IX, relating to unemployment compensation, and imposing a tax on pay rolls in connection therewith.

Titles IV, V, and VI, making appropriations for aid to the States in the care of dependent children, for maternal and child-welfare work and for public health generally.

I am opposed to titles II, III, VIII, and IX.

The social security bill is a great step forward in sociology, because it is a distinct recognition by our country of the necessity for nationally securing old age against want, and it indicates an acknowledgment that society owes an obligation in the care of crippled and dependent children.

CONFUSION OF SUBJECTS IN THE BILL

The measure under consideration should be broken down into several separate bills to avoid multiplicity of subjects in this one bill. In its present form, the bill is cumbersome and highly complex.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS

Insofar as the bill provides reasonable assistance to the States in meeting the cost of old-age pensions for those in need, its purpose is worthy and has my support. Nor can there be any objection to aiding the States in caring for dependent children, in providing for maternal and child health, and for public health generally. The cost of these projects would not be excessive, and can be met out of the general revenues of the Treasury.

To call upon the States to provide suitable pensions for the aged in this present economic depression is merely an attempt to shift the responsibility which must be borne by our National Government. Some States are now already bankrupt and in default on pensions now past due under their present wholly inadequate pension laws. Any attempt to rely upon the States in any old-age-pension plan will defeat the very object we seek to attain.

The administering of the proposed economic-security bill will result in discrimination because people who live in States with financial conditions satisfactory will receive benefits far beyond and out of proportion to the benefits given to citizens of a State which is bankrupt and unable to participate under the provisions of the administration proposal.

For instance, in the State of North Dakota, a pension which became due a certain pensioner for the entire year of 1934, amounting to $150, was not paid because it could not be paid and finally, on January 3, 1935, pensioner was obliged to accept a mere pittance of $3.96 in full payment of that $150 obligation. In this kind of a situation, how could the State of North Dakota take advantage of the old-age-pension plan contemplated in this measure?

May I ask the gentleman from North Dakota, if he votes for this legislation, how is he going to make his people believe that he has voted to give them relief?

Mr. BURDICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota.

Mr. BURDICK. Has the gentleman any figures in reference to the income from old-age pensions last year in the State of Minnesota?

Mr. KNUTSON. I have it here, yes. In Minnesota the old-age-pension law is optional.

Mr. KELLER. What does the gentleman mean by "optional"?

Mr. KNUTSON. It is up to the counties whether they will grant an old-age pension.

Mr. BURDICK. Then there is none in the State law?

Mr. KNUTSON. No. We have no State pension.

Mr. BURDICK. As little as our pension is, is it not better than that existing in the gentleman's State? [Applause.]

Mr. KNUTSON. If anyone can find it in his heart to applaud the payment of $3.96 for a year's pension, I suggest that they move over to China where the people live on dried fish and rice.

Mr. SIROVICH. Still it is better than the gentleman's State, which is nothing.

Mr. KNUTSON. How does the gentleman know?

Mr. SIROVICH. Because it was stated that the gentleman's State gives optional pensions and the counties give nothing.

Mr. KNUTSON. I am sorry that the gentleman's power of understanding is so limited.

Mr. SIROVICH. It is very good. Will the gentleman state it himself?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. According to the table here, it shows that Minnesota last year paid pensions to 2,655 persons and that there are 94,000 eligible; also that the average rate of pension was $13.20 per month and that the yearly total paid was $420,936.

Mr. KNUTSON. That is correct. The gentleman from New York will find that table on page 5 of the committee report.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I understand the point that the gentleman from Minnesota makes is that probably North Dakota will not be able to meet the conditions of this bill and will not get any of this relief.

Mr. KNUTSON. Why, North Dakota is not the only State that cannot avail itself of the provisions of this bill. Montana cannot, and neither can the State of Oregon, and I doubt very much if the State of Mississippi can.

Mr. McGROARTY. And California.

Mr. KNUTSON. And probably California cannot. I presume if the matter were gone into fully it will be found that more than half of the States will be unable to take advantage of the legislation.

Mr. Chairman, that is the reason I am protesting against it, because it is an illusion bigger than anything we have had since the great Mississippi bubble.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Referring to California and the same table to which the gentleman made reference a moment ago, it shows that at the present time there are 19,309 persons in California receiving an average pension of $21.16 per month, or a total of $3,502,000.

Mr. McGROARTY. When was that?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. That is for the year 1934.

Mr. SIROVICH. Is there anything for North Dakota in there in that same connection?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The table shows that in North Dakota no pension is being paid.

Mr. DISNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. DISNEY. Is it the gentleman's theory that we should absolve the States from any participation at all in connection with old-age pensions and put the entire burden on the Federal Government?

Mr. KNUTSON. It is.

Mr. DISNEY. If so, how far can the gentleman visualize that theory going?

Mr. KNUTSON. I may say to the gentleman why I feel that the Federal Government should shoulder the entire burden. Under the plan proposed by the administration you have discrimination in favor of people who live in States that are satisfactorily set up financially, and who will receive benefits far above the benefits received by people living in bankrupt States. Therefore I call it discrimination. Now, how can you discriminate between American citizens? In other words, you should not penalize some because they live in North Dakota or Montana.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Or Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. Or Minnesota or Kentucky. That is what you are proposing to do in this legislation. It is discrimination, and that is why I am protesting against this bill in its present form.

Mr. DISNEY. Is the gentleman going to solve all the ills of mankind by the process of the Federal Government, thereby relieving the local governments? From the standpoint of discrimination, nothing is equal.

Mr. KNUTSON. We might just as well pay the money out in pensions as to spend it for windbreaks.

Mr. DISNEY. That is not an answer to the question.

Mr. KNUTSON. We might better pay the money out in pensions than to create relief maps showing the movement of peoples in the second millennium in the Mediterranean and the Euphrates areas. I understand that they prepared one up in New York that cost the price of 18,000 tons of hay and yet our cattle in Minnesota are being shot because there is no feed for them. [Applause.]

Mr. WADSWORTH. Has the gentleman given any consideration to rhythmic dancing?

Mr. KNUTSON. Let me say that about all they will get out of this legislation will be rhythmic dancing.

Mr. McGROARTY. Who will pay the piper?

Mr. KNUTSON. The music will be furnished with skulls and cross bones.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. PERKINS. As I understand this bill, all employers are taxed, whether the employees are in his State or not, and there is also the system of unemployment relief.

Mr. KNUTSON. Certainly, that is true.

Mr. PERKINS. So that if a State does not set up a system of unemployment relief, the employers pay and contribute to other States?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. And the purpose of the bill is to induce each State to set up a system of unemployment relief?

Mr. KNUTSON. Not to induce—to coerce. There is a distinction between the two words.

Mr. PERKINS. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. How is this so-called "9 percent on the pay roll" figured? I have not quite understood that.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman should not ask a member of the committee too many embarrassing questions because there is not a man on the committee that really understands this bill. It was drawn by members of the "brain trust", many of whom, probably, had never earned a dollar in their lives and they are not earning anything now—theorists, college professors, young whippersnappers, some of them not dry behind the ears. [Laughter.] Although I will say that the Ways and Means Committee has greatly improved the measure that the "brain trust" sent up to us.

Mr. PERKINS. On page 5 of the committee report it appears that the number of pensioners in the United States is 180,003 and the number of eligibles in 1930 was 2,330,390.

Mr. KNUTSON. That is the number of those over the age of 65. The gentleman has brought up another matter. Is there anyone in this House—do you, Brother McGROARTY, believe it is going to help the unemployment situation to limit the benefit of this legislation to those who have passed the age of 65?

Mr. McGROARTY. No; and especially it will not in 1970. They will not be here.

Mr. KNUTSON. No; we will not be here and there will not be many of us left. [Laughter.]

Mr. McGROARTY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes.

Mr. McGROARTY. The gentleman who preceded the gentleman now speaking, a member of the Ways and Means Committee, said this bill is very difficult to understand.

Mr. KNUTSON. Oh, we all admit that.

Mr. McGROARTY. The gentleman is a member of the committee, is he not?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes; and I do not understand it.

Mr. McGROARTY. Then how, in the name of God, do they expect me to understand it on 20 hours' notice? That is what I want to know.

Mr. KNUTSON. Well, you are supposed to take it on faith.

Mr. McGROARTY. Can it not be put over until the next Congress and give us some time to study it?

Mr. KNUTSON. What you should do is to go down and talk to the authors of the bill, and you might get some information.

Mr. McGROARTY. Please give me their names.

Mr. KNUTSON. Well, they are given here in the report. They are a lot of college professors.

Mr. McGROARTY. I refuse to talk to college professors. Give me the names of some practical people. [Laughter.]

Mr. KNUTSON. Well, go down and talk to William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor. He is a good, level-headed man.

Mr. McGROARTY. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. But he is about the only one I see here in whose judgment I have full confidence.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. What is the gentleman's plan to take care of the unemployment in this country?

Mr. KNUTSON. What is my plan?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Reassure industry.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. How?

Mr. KNUTSON. By removing all the uncertainty that you folks have created. Let us assure industry and we will end unemployment in a short time.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. You had the opportunity from 1929 to 1933 and you did not remove it under the previous administration, but increased it.

Mr. KNUTSON. As I have told you on previous occasions, this depression is due to the war—the war that you folks promised to keep us out of. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Why did you not cure the situation in 4 years?

Mr. KNUTSON. Because during the last 2 years of Mr. Hoover's administration we had a Democratic House and you folks were determined that there should be no recovery until after the election of 1932.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. If the gentleman will permit, I understand the statement was made by the gentleman from Washington, in reference to a national bill, that the cost of such a bill would exceed $10,000,000,000. The report on the bill (H. R. 2827), to which I have called the attention of the Members, shows that the economists and other authorities state that the minimum cost would be $4,060,000,000 and not to exceed $5,800,000,000, as given by the economist Dr. Gilman, of the City College of New York, and I thank the gentleman for an opportunity to correct that statement.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Referring to the members of the Advisory Council, if my memory serves me correctly, the gentleman from Minnesota represented that Mr. Nordlin, who appeared before the committee and testified on behalf of title I and particularly in favor of granting aid to States for old-age pensions, was A no. 1 in every particular, and I believe he happens to come from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes; and after Senator Nordlin testified he called at my office and I asked him how many times he had been called in, and, as I recall, he said twice in 6 weeks.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. But we can follow Mr. Nordlin's testimony, can we not?

Mr. KNUTSON. We can; yes. You can follow Mr. Nordlin's testimony. He is a fine gentleman.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. And Mr. Nordlin is for the bill and particularly stressed title I, granting aid to States for old-age pensions.

Mr. KNUTSON. As the gentleman will recall, Mr. Nordlin applauded the purposes of the bill——

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The statement of Mr. Nordlin——

Mr. KNUTSON. I am sorry, but I cannot yield further.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. When I get hold of the printed page I notice the gentleman finds it convenient not to yield, but I shall insert in my remarks the statement he made that the Fraternal Order of Eagles that he was representing is very strongly back of the proposition of grants and aids to the States in order that these pension systems may be continued. That is just one thing he said that was very splendid.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Has the gentleman from Minnesota read the bill H. R. 2827, introduced by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LUNDEEN].

Mr. KNUTSON. I do not want to be diverted by discussing other legislation.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. I think that would take care of the situation if enacted into law.

Mr. KNUTSON. Well, it would not be the first good thing that has come out of Minnesota. My idea of this legislation would be something that would aid recovery, something that would lift the burden of industry and remove all uncertainty.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman tell us what will do it?

Mr. KNUTSON. You are not going to do it by putting a 9-percent tax on pay rolls, and that is what you are doing here. You are going to further increase unemployment by this legislation. You must take some other method than you are pursuing here. My heavens, you have tried everything but mustard plasters. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman give us his plan?

Mr. KNUTSON. You cannot justify a humilitating failure by asking me what I would do in a situation not presented to me for solution. That task is yours.

Under the unemployment-insurance title employers pay a tax on the pay roll for the calendar year of 1 percent, 2 percent for 1937, and 3 percent for the calendar year 1938, and each year thereafter.

According to the committee's own report, this means an additional burden on industry of $228,000,000 the first year, and that is going to gradually increase until you put an additional annual burden on industry of $900,000,000, or 90 cents for every minute since the Christian era.

(The time of Mr. KNUTSON having expired, he was given 10 minutes more.)

Mr. KNUTSON. Now, under the contributory provision, the employers pay another pay-roll tax of 1 percent for 1937, reaching 3 percent in 1949. That tax puts an entire burden of $280,000,000 on industry the first year, and gradually creeps up to $900,000,000. There you have $1,800,000,000 tax burden in the two taxes, which is another thing this bill does. Such a burden would not alone retard business recovery but would increase unemployment.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. KNUTSON. No; I decline to yield to the gentleman. He does not ask questions to get information, but merely to embarrass the speaker. If the gentleman were truly seeking light I would be glad to have him ask his question, but he is not. He will follow the orders he gets from down at the other end of the Avenue regardless of where such orders may lead him.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. It has been said here that these funds will be built up to amount to $32,000,000,000. Can any of that principal be used as the years go by to meet these annuities, or is it limited only to the income from that fund?

Mr. KNUTSON. By the time that fund is created, if the Republicans are not then in power, the money will probably be used in operating the Government.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. There is one other question. Is one entitled to participate in any of these annuities of unemployment insurance unless he has had 5 years of employment?

Mr. KNUTSON. I think that is required.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Oh, not for unemployment insurance.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I am speaking of annuities.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The payment of annuities does not begin until 1942. That is correct.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. It has been stated that there are something like 13,000,000 workers in this country between the ages of 45 and 65, and we know, especially in the mining industry and in railroad work, that when you seek initial employment in the coal mines or on the railroads, you must sign a card that you are under 45 years of age. What is there in this bill to take care of those 13,000,000?

Mr. KNUTSON. There is nothing in this bill to take care of them. That is another shortcoming of this legislation. When a person is unemployable he is unemployable, whether he be 45 or 65, and they should be treated alike.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. When will anyone get any of this old-age pension, provided the States will cooperate? When will the first payment be made?

Mr. KNUTSON. I think in some of the States it will go to the heirs. Here is another thing you are doing here. You are proposing to set up a new bureau. Of course, I realize that that is your long suit—setting up new bureaus. You were strong against them before election, but stronger than horse radish for them since. You are going to have a new bureau to administer this fund. Now, let us see, what is the name of that bureau?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Security Commission.

Mr. KNUTSON. Oh, no, that is another bureau. The gentleman has the two confused and I do not blame him, because there are so many of them. What is the name of this bureau?

Mr. TABER. The Social Security Bureau.

Mr. KNUTSON. To be sure. I think I know what qualifications will be necessary for a job with that Bureau, but I shall not touch on that now. We now have the Veterans' Administration that is admirably and fully equipped to handle this old-age-pension fund. The Veterans' Bureau is handling all other pension matters, including the Federal retirement fund, but I suppose the opportunity for creating another bureau was just too great a temptation to resist. There is one thing I admire about you folks, and that is your ability to think up new jobs.

As I see it, the prime need of the hour is business recovery. This unemployment insurance and this annuity plan at best are but experiments. There is no immediate hurry for any of this legislation, save old-age pensions, because if we do pass the bill, it cannot possibly go into effect until 1937 or probably several years thereafter.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. Just let me finish my thought, please. Why do we not break down this bill into four measures, and let each one stand on its own bottom. There is no connection between old-age pensions and unemployment annuities. Let us pass an old-age-pension bill that will give adequate relief to the aged.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. And what is that? That is what I am looking for.

Mr. KNUTSON. I would say $50 or better a month.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. To how many people?

Mr. KNUTSON. I am speaking of individuals.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The gentleman is willing to give them $50 a month?

Mr. KNUTSON. That would be the minimum. I would give them enough. Up in our country a person cannot live in comfort for less than $100 a month where they have to pay rent and buy fuel.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. That sounds all right, but how many people are you going to take in on that?

Mr. KNUTSON. How many would the gentleman be in favor of taking in?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Let me tell the gentleman.

Mr. KNUTSON. My time is running. Please let me get on.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I will tell the gentleman when I get the floor.

Mr. KNUTSON. I will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. I am seriously concerned, representing a district in which considerable industry exists, whether or not the gentleman's committee gave any consideration to the possibility of how industry will raise this money to pay this 9-percent pay-roll tax. Can the gentleman answer that?

Mr. KNUTSON. We are just going to open the goose and see how many golden eggs she contains. That is what this bill will do. It will close all factories. It will do just exactly what the N. R. A. did, only much worse. Does that answer the gentleman's question? [Laughter.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield.

Mr. TREADWAY. How long will that goose last, with the golden eggs?

Mr. KNUTSON. Well, I do not think it will last beyond one meal.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. The gentleman is a distinguished member of the Ways and Means Committee, and, of course, was present at the hearings. I would like to have the gentleman tell the House how many industrial leaders of this Nation appeared before the committee in opposition to this bill?

Mr. KNUTSON. Well, you know the industrial leaders do not dare to come to Washington and talk against any legislation——

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Very well. Can the gentleman answer the question or not?

Mr. KNUTSON. I am telling the gentleman why they do not come.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. How many people, speaking for industry, appeared in opposition to the bill?

Mr. KNUTSON. Oh, the gentleman knows why they did not appear.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. They appear here on everything else.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman knows why they did not appear.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. How many of them were here?

Mr. KNUTSON. None.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Very well.

Mr. KNUTSON. Because if they had appeared the R. F. C. would have called their loans.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Minnesota 5 additional minutes.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] knows why they did not appear. They did not dare to appear. That is plain. Certainly Mr. Emery appeared, and, in a very temperate statement, stated as forcibly as he dared, his opposition to this bill. You know that he represented American manufacturers, many of whom are probably beholden to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation or some other governmental agency, or some bank on which the R. F. C. has a stranglehold. If you will read Mr. Emery's statement, you will find that he seriously doubted the wisdom of this legislation and called particular attention to the fact that industry could not carry the additional burdens we were proposing to impose upon them.

Delay in the present situation is dangerous. Under the proposal in the administration bill pensions cannot become effective for 2 or more years in those States wherein the legislature has already adjourned without having made any proper or adequate provision to enable such States to participate.

The Federal Government has no power to compel any State to adopt laws in accordance with this proposal by the administration, or to enact any pension law, and in any State which does not adopt a penison law to conform to the proposed measure, there can be no immediate pension relief for the aged, and these old people must be taken care of now.

Aside from these practical considerations entering into the tax features of this proposal, there is also a grave question of constitutionality, particularly in the case of the joint tax on employer and employee for the purpose of setting up a fund for the payment of retirement annuities.

Congress may impose taxes only to provide revenue for the Government. This tax on its face is not for the purpose of providing revenue for Federal purposes, but it is simply an enforced contribution for the benefit of a certain class of persons.

COMPULSORY CONTRIBUTORY ANNUITIES AND UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

As to the provisions of this proposed bill relating to contributory annuities and unemployment compensation, it is my belief they cannot be justified at this time.

In my opinion, the passage of this proposed legislation will further and definitely increase unemployment. I fear that titles VIII and IX hold out an incentive or inducement to employers to reduce the number of their employees to a minimum in order to avoid or reduce the taxes imposed upon them by these two titles. I am convinced that at this time the annuity and unemployment provisions constitute a serious threat to recovery because they impose two distinct pay-roll taxes, one of which falls entirely upon the employer and the other jointly upon the employer and employee.

I believe the age limit of 65 years is too high to be of assistance in solving the unemployment problem. We well know that it is exceedingly difficult for a person to secure employment after passing the age of 60. This is a machine age, and industry wants young and active workers. At 60 workers generally are considered unemployable. The question then arises, What shall become of those who are laid off at age 60 and who are unable to find other jobs? We cannot let them starve, and it is not fair to make them paupers before granting relief. Shortening the hours of toil will not solve this problem.

Under the unemployment-insurance titles the employer pays a tax of 1 percent of his pay roll for the calendar year 1936, 2 percent for the year 1937, and 3 percent for the year 1938 and subsequent years. According to the committee report, this means an initial burden of $228,000,000 the first year, $500,000,000 the second year, and from $800,000,000 to $900,000,000 annually thereafter.

Under the contributory-annuity provision the employer pays another pay-roll tax, which begins with a rate of 1 percent in the year 1937 and reaches a maximum of 3 percent in the year 1949. This tax begins with an initial burden of $280,000,000, which gradually increases up to $900,000,000 annually.

Considering these two taxes together, employers will be required to bear an additional tax burden of $228,000,000 in the year 1936, $800,000,000 in the year 1937, and a gradually increasing amount thereafter until the maximum of $1,800,000,000 per annum is reached in 1949. This staggering total would be in addition to the present Federal, State, and local taxes. How long will industry be able to carry this burden?

The tax on employees also begins with a 1-percent rate and reaches a maximum of 3 percent in 12 years. It will be deducted from their pay envelops in an amount ranging from $280,000,000 in the first year to a maximum of $900,000,000 annually.

In general terms this bill imposes a maximum tax of 3 percent on employers for unemployment insurance. It imposes another 3-percent tax on employers for retirement annuities. It also imposes a 3-percent tax on employees. The result is that by January 1, 1949, there will be a triple tax on pay rolls of 9 percent, imposing on employers and employees a total burden of nearly $3,000,000,000 annually in addition to all other taxes.

Business recovery at the present time hangs in a very delicate balance. Every additional burden of this kind upon business, however small, tends to make recovery more remote; hence, imposing directly upon industry such a tremendous burden as I have mentioned is bound to cause a reaction which will result in prolonging the depression indefinitely.

Not alone will business be affected by the direct burden which is imposed upon it by this bill, but business will be seriously affected and depressed by having taken from it annually the $280,000,000 to $900,000,000 which is taken from the annual pay roll of the working class and withdrawn from the channels of trade.

The tax on pay rolls will fall alike on all kinds of business, whether operating at a profit or operating at a loss and may mean the difference between solvency and insolvency. Moreover, since this tax imposes a penalty on employment, it will tend to cause employers to get along with a minimum number of employees, and thereby it will tend to increase unemployment. This tax, when applied to the employee, operates as a gross-income tax, and it is, therefore, discriminatory.

When this tax is applied to the consumer it has the same effect on prices as a turnover or general sales tax. There will be a tendency to pyramid the tax for the various operations, from raw material to finished product, and this will cause a material increase in the cost of living.

If the administration cannot see its way clear to adopt a manufacturers' excise tax (with food and clothing exempted) for the purpose of making up a part of the Treasury deficit, I do not see how it can conscientiously support the tax on pay rolls and pay checks for the purpose of furnishing unemployment relief and old-age annuities.

UNNECESSARY AND CUMBERSOME BUREAUS

I do not approve the growing tendency of Congress to constantly set up needless, complicated, cumbersome, and expensive governmental machinery to carry into effect new policies and programs that are more or less experimental.

For 125 years this Government followed a pension policy in dealing with its defenders that had proven highly satisfactory to pensioner and Government alike.

But in the year 1917 Congress created, over my protest, the so-called "War Risk Insurance Bureau", now known as the "Veterans' Administration", to deal with pensions, and this Bureau has already cost the American people endless hundreds of millions of dollars for its administration, using money that should have gone to the veterans, and without giving the veterans any increased benefits.

In this social-security legislation it is proposed to repeat that expensive mistake, as you would set up another costly and cumbersome bureau to administer a new experimental pension system by and through which we will again spend hundreds of millions of dollars, over a period of years, to operate a new and unnecessary Government machine, and again the cost thereof will come out of the pockets of the taxpayers and the beneficiaries.

The Bureau of Veterans' Affairs is already equipped to handle some of the benefits to be granted under this legislation.

The Children's Bureau will administer the benefits granted by title V.

The Public Health Service will administer the work under title VI.

Why do we talk against the establishment of new bureaus and yet constantly vote to create them? Why extend further this generally recognized evil, especially in this time of great national distress when there is so great a need for rigid economy?

REAL ECONOMIC SECURITY

The administration proposal does not provide any real increase in the buying power of the American people, neither will it provide work for the idle and unemployed; in fact, it will do the opposite by imposing a burdensome tax load without giving any immediate benefits.

In the first place, I believe that this measure should be so drawn as to be of immediate aid in ending the business depression. It should set the age limit of beneficiaries at 60, so as to take up a considerable portion of the present unemployment slack. It should fix the benefits at such a figure as will make possible dependable commodity consumption, production, and employment, thereby bringing to an early termination this distressing business depression, which is daily growing worse.

The prime need of the hour is recovery, not social reform. Since these proposals to which I am opposed are definitely within the scope of social reform, there is no compelling reason for taking them up at this time unless when so doing we provide a proper measure to restore business volume.

I am very sympathetic toward these social reforms. They should and must be given thoughtful and friendly consideration. However, it should be kept in mind that neither the old-age annuity nor unemployment insurance provisions of the bill are intended to provide immediate relief in their respective fields. They have no bearing upon the present unemployment situation, and my opposition to them at this time in no wise constitutes any lack of appreciation of the problems of those now in need. Rather, I feel that I am doing them a distinct service by insisting that nothing be allowed to impede business recovery and the resumption of normal working conditions. After all, a job is better than a dole.

My idea of an old-age-pension plan is one that will retire from gainful employment all persons at the age of 60 and over, thereby making places for the young who are now unable to find work. The plan should carry a sufficient annuity to give such buying power as will immediately tend to place production and consumption upon a firm, dependable, and permanent basis. That would largely obviate the danger of future depressions. Such a plan would be absolutely sound and workable in every respect. It should be financed in a manner to equalize the burden.

Our country is now in a precarious condition, and the demand is for immediate relief. No half-way measure will suffice. It is our manifest duty to provide adequate relief, and to do so at once.

The administration bill cannot provide any relief before the year 1937 and years will elapse before it can give any tangible benefits. We cannot wait that long. To do so will imperil the very safety of our country.

This prolonged business depression will not be overcome until we adopt a definite plan to make adequate provision for, and to enforce, spending and buying by the public in sufficient amount and volume to absorb the products of industry and agriculture required for our standard of living.

The national situation is now far too serious and critical to permit any mere gesture in this matter. We must have a measure that will actually and permanently afford relief to our aged people and give employment to approximately 10,000,000 workers who are now idle, and who, together with their dependents, are being supported by Government money procured by bond issues which steadily increase the public debt.

This Congress will be derelict in its duty if it fails to enact a measure that will enable and permit the business of our country to resume activities in a manner to furnish employment for all citizens who should now be employed, to equitably distribute the rewards of honest labor, and to give security to our aged people in a dignified manner without reducing them to pauperism.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated in the foregoing, I favor a change in title I and the elimination of titles II, III, VIII, and IX.

Mr. Chairman, I herewith append my supplemental report:

SUPPLEMENTAL VIEWS OF MR. KNUTSON

While I concur in a general way with the conclusions of my colleagues of the minority, there are certain provisions of the bill so obnoxious to me that I cannot support it. My reasons for voting against the measure are as follows:

1. It is obvious from the provisions of this bill that it cannot be made effective for several years, hence it will be a bitter disappointment to those who have looked hopefully to this administration for immediate relief.

2. The measure is wholly inadequate and therefore will not give the result sought to be obtained.

3. The age limit of 65 is too high to give the needed relief. The limit should be fixed at 60, which would help the unemployment situation materially and at the same time care for a large number now out of work and who by reason of age are unemployable.

4. The old-age pension to be granted under H. R. 7260 would be wholly inadequate in the relief of distress. The amount paid would be so small that its effect upon business would be negligible.

5. The administering of this law will result in discrimination. People living in States that are bankrupt, or nearly so, will receive absolutely no benefits from this legislation. These people must be taken care of by the National Government.

6. The two pay-roll taxes which the bill imposes will greatly retard business recovery by driving many industries, now operating at a loss, into bankruptcy, or by forcing them to close down entirely, thereby further increasing unemployment, which would greatly retard recovery.

7. Many small concerns having 12 or 15 employees would discharge enough employees to exempt them from the payment of the pay-roll taxes, which would yet further aggravate the unemployment situation.

8. The proposal to establish a new bureau to administer this law is indefensible and a needless expense to the taxpayers. In the interest of economy the administration of the law should be vested in the Veterans' Administration, which is equipped to handle this activity.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I have been studying this bill ever since it was reported out by the Ways and Means Committee about a week ago. I believe this bill will go down in history, not as the social security bill, but as the 9 percent pay roll tax bill, a bill designed to impose taxes upon the employer and employee amounting to 9 percent. Frankly I cannot figure any way it can come out of anyone except the employee, because the purchasing power of the country will not absorb any higher prices than we are carrying now, and the employers are now mostly operating in the red, so that they will not be able to absorb that tax. Three percent of it is levied directly upon labor. The bill is designed to cost approximately four to four and a half billion dollars in all. There is approximately $3,000,000,000 on account of the 9-percent pay-roll tax; approximately eight or nine hundred million under the old-age relief, and it will run from two to three or four million under the other items in the bill. Frankly I do not see how the people of the United States can bear the burden. In addition to that, there is this situation: Many industries have already set up old-age-retirement propositions for their employees. Many industries are taking care of unemployment insurance themselves. No exemption is made for those people. In addition to the burden they are now carrying, they will have to meet the pay-roll tax, and their employees will have to meet the pay-roll tax that is set up in this bill. Frankly I do not believe the bill has had the kind of consideration that a bill should have, to be brought here by the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. WOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. WOOD. Can the gentleman tell me what industries are taking care of their employees on unemployment features?

Mr. TABER. I know that a great many of them are.

Mr. WOOD. Can the gentleman name one?

Mr. TABER. I know that a great many of them are locally, in my part of the country. I am not going to name them in detail, but a great many of them are.

Mr. WOOD. I would like to have the gentleman mention one of them.

Mr. TABER. Many of them are taking care of them. The American Telephone & Telegraph Co. is taking care of those to a very large extent.

Mr. WOOD. That is not unemployment insurance.

Mr. TABER. Oh, but it is, if the gentleman would study it.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. TREADWAY. Was the inquiry relative to the number of employees that private corporations are caring for?

Mr. TABER. No. The inquiry was with reference to unemployment insurance. A great many of these people are paying their help when they are out of employment—sick, and a great many of them are being paid when they are unable to provide them with employment.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. With the private pension system, after a man had worked for 15 or 20 years and was laid off or discharged, he would lose the pension; is that not true?

Mr. TABER. Some corporations have a rule that if they are laid off or discharged prior to the attainment of their retirement privilege they would receive no compensation. Others take care of them just as well as this bill takes care of them. This bill provides nothing unless they have worked for 5 years in continuous employment.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. But, after that all citizens are provided for?

Mr. TABER. Oh, no; only those who have worked steadily for 5 years.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman is not correct in that assumption.

Mr. TABER. What is it?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. It is not continuous service.

Mr. TABER. Is it service at all?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. It is 5 years' service.

Mr. TABER. Under that he might work 1 day a year. But it is limited to a certain percentage of the amount of their earnings during that period.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. That is correct.

Mr. TABER. And if they are not employed any great length of time the annuity will not amount to anything.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. But certainly the gentleman does not want to leave the impression that it has to be continuous service with one employer.

Mr. TABER. Perhaps that is correct. I thank the gentleman for the correction. At the same time, the pension will not amount to anything unless a man has steady employment; there is no question about that. These people will be on the old-age roll just the same unless they have had a long, continuous service.

I want to call attention now to some of the other high points that seem to me to stand out in this bill. I may be mistaken about this one, but I want to call the attention of the committee to pages 10, 11, and 12, where the gross amount that can be repaid to any employee is limited to 3½ percent of the amount of the wages he has received. When this bill gets to swinging, the amount of tax that will have been paid is 6 percent of the amount of the wages the employee has received, yet he is limited in the gross amount he may receive to 3½ percent of the amount of those wages. That leaves, if I understand it correctly, 2½ percent for administration. Two and one-half percent is 41⅔ percent of 6, so this means 41⅔ percent for administrative expenses. Is not that correct?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Please explain how the 6 percent that is paid in is arrived at.

Mr. TABER. I did not say that the employee paid it in. I said that there had been paid in under title VIII, under the gross pay-roll tax there provided, 6 percent. Is not this correct?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The employer will pay 3 percent and the employee will pay 3 percent.

Mr. TABER. Well, 3 and 3 make 6.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. They make 6.

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. He gets back all he pays in, certainly, and more.

Mr. TABER. He gets back for what his employer has to pay, one-sixth; that is what he gets; and that means that this bill is setting up a law that requires a 41⅔-percent cost for administration.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The gentlemen is referring to cases where this payment is made to the employee before he arrives at the eligible age of 65 for the annuity.

Mr. TABER. Not the way I understand this language, because as I understand the language it means that this is the rule with reference to any individual who dies after attaining the age of 65 or who has received annuities thereafter which run over 3½ percent of the total amount of the pay that he has received.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. If the gentleman will yield further, that is exactly what I was trying to direct the gentleman's attention to. The employee gets back more than he pays in.

Mr. TABER. Of the amount he has paid in, but not more than he and his employer together have paid in. That means that there goes into this fund 41⅔ percent—I find I was correct in this situation—for administration. It means that the employee will pay the whole of that 6 percent in the long run and the gentleman is using a set-up requiring 41⅔ percent out of the pay rolls of the poor to provide jobs for the faithful. That is just what it means.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? The gentleman always is fair.

Mr. TABER. I try to be.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. He is very accurate generally.

Mr. TABER. Let me find the trouble, tell me.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Close up to the age of 65 are the near-aged. The 3½-percent repayment to those dying before 65 is the principal plus one-half percent which is conserved as interest.

In the old-age benefits there is the problem, what might be called unearned annuities to the near-aged. For example, if a person were 59 years of age and earned $3,000 over a period of 5 years under the present bill, he would get $15 a month; whereas the 3½-percent feature to which the gentleman refers to, would give him only $105 as a total lump-sum payment. In other words, the near-aged, those who are near the 65-year age limit, get the break in what might be termed unearned annuities, which are made possible by payments of employers. Consequently, the gentleman's figure of 41⅔ percent for administrative costs, must be materially reduced. In fact, we were told in the committee that the administrative costs would be about 5 percent of the benefits paid.

Mr. TABER. I am very frank to say I cannot understand the gentleman's explanation, although I have tried to.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I am trying to help the gentleman; I would like to if I could.

Mr. TABER. I appreciate that, but my time is limited and I cannot yield further. When the gentleman gets the floor in his own right I would like to have him explain why my figure of 41⅔ percent for administrative cost is not correct.

Frankly, from what the gentleman from Washington told me, and insofar as I have been able to follow what the gentleman from Kentucky has told me, the 41⅔ percent figure for administrative cost is correct.

There are other things to which I wish to call attention. Insofar as I can follow title III, there is no definite set-up of benefits, or no concrete definition of how unemployment insurance should be set up. It is left to this board which is to be created. Now, why should we delegate more authority to boards if we are going to have anything of this kind? Frankly, I think it is an impossible burden which is being placed upon the public. We ought to meet the responsibility ourselves of setting up definitely what is to be done rather than to have the thing turned over to somebody else to work out. I think we have had altogether too many boards, altogether too much delegation of authority.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Would not the gentleman much prefer the board provided for in this bill rather than to have the present Secretary of Labor designated to make this set-up as was provided in the original bill?

Mr. TABER. That would be worse.

We ought to set up what we are going to do definitely and not vote for a "pig in a poke."

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. There is one thing in this set-up that was most shocking to me, and I know it would shock the gentleman much more, and that is in connection with the original bill the "brain trusters" and those who put the bill together thought that this great, colossal matter should be administered by one institution in charge of the present Secretary of Labor.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. TABER. I think the set-up that came over from the "brain trust" was worse than this one. I think we ought to strike from the bill titles II and III.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I say to the gentleman that striking titles II and III would make title VII simply a political set-up with nothing to do.

Mr. TABER. That is correct. We should strike title VII and we should also strike titles VIII and IX.

Mr. TREADWAY. That is correct.

Mr. TABER. Unless you go ahead in an intelligent way to meet this problem you are not going to meet it at all. Title I of the controversial titles is all there is to this bill that deserves any consideration whatever. Title I is the section that relates to old-age pensions. Unquestionably we have to meet the situation in some way, and I do not care to shirk that responsibility. Frankly, I feel it is a matter that the States should ultimately handle for themselves rather than for the Federal Government to handle it, but I do feel in the present emergency and in the present situation the Federal Government should make a temporary contribution. We should also keep titles IV, V, and VI.

Mr. Chairman, I think we should go ahead and pass a bill providing something of this kind which will take care of people who are in distress, but I do not believe we should attempt a broad set-up along the line as outlined in sections under titles II and III with the tremendous 9 percent pay-roll tax. I do not think we should think of such a thing until we have observed how the old-age situation will work out and how it will take care of the people. If we attempt to burden industry with more drawbacks and with more things that will prevent business recovery, we are going to be just exactly where we are now, and get worse and worse every day. That is the difficulty with the existing situation.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. PERKINS. I would like someone to explain why we hear the words "9-percent tax" quoted so often. How does the gentleman figure this 9-percent tax?

Mr. TABER. Well, 3 percent on the employer under title VIII, 3 percent on the employee under title VIII, and 3 percent on the employer under title IX; 3 plus 3 plus 3 make 9. That is the way it goes, as I understand the matter. Is that not correct?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. The gentleman is right.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. As of 1949.

Mr. TABER. That is at the final wind up. The amount of the tax and the percentage in effect on any particular day is given in a table that appears on page 44 of the report, according to estimates. Whether those estimates are right or not, I do not know. The members of the committee can tell you more about that than I can.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this tremendous tax should not be imposed on industry in such a way that it will stop and clog recovery. I think that this Congress has done almost nothing but attempt to prevent recovery ever since the 1st of March 1933. I think we ought to stop those bills that are designed by the "brain trust" and which can have no effect upon the situation in America today except to prevent and restrain and keep back business from recovery. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ENGEL].

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I did not expect to speak on this bill. I am for an adequate old-age-pension law. Up until the time this bill was reported by the committee I thought I was for unemployment insurance. After looking over the bill and looking over its provisions I am wondering whether or not I am for unemployment insurance.

Mr. Chairman, my district consists of 11 counties. The major portion of the population is rural. My experience covering a number of years in State legislative work tells me that in the final analysis every tax is paid by the consumer. It is passed on to the consumer, and I do not believe this tax is going to be an exception. The factory owner and the industrialist will have to add his share of the tax to his cost of production, which will in turn be added to the cost of the article manufactured, and, of course, increasing the purchase price of the article.

Mr. Chairman, I am informed, and I think correctly, that 40 percent of the purchasing power of the country is in the farmer. If this bill is to cost approximately $2,000,000,000 a year, as stated in the report of the committee, $800,000,000 of this amount is going to be passed on to the consuming farmer. If it is true that you are going to have a reserve fund of $32,000,000,000, it means that $12,800,000,000 of this reserve fund is going to be paid by that part of the consuming public known as the "farmer." In view of the fact that he is exempt from the several subdivisions of the bill—that is, the unemployment section and the old-age reserve fund—and would properly be so exempt, I am wondering just what I can tell the farmers back home in justification of a vote for this measure. I may say frankly that I do not know at this time how I am going to vote on the bill. I am wondering just where we are going with this sort of legislation.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ENGEL. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. The gentleman understands that the farmers are entitled to benefits under title I?

Mr. ENGEL. Yes; but the gentleman also understands that the $2,000,000,000 does not finance title I. It finances the unemployment insurance and the old-age annuity which is paid by the pay-roll tax.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. The gentleman is talking about some figures given by some gentleman on that side of the aisle. I am talking about the provisions of title I, which, of course, provide benefits for the farmers that the gentleman is concerned about.

Mr. ENGEL. Absolutely; and he is paying for that out of a $49,000,000 appropriation provided for in the bill.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. If the gentleman will permit, the benefits under title I with respect to old-age pensions are paid for out of the General Treasury and not out of the reserve account, and the unemployment compensation is not paid out of the reserve account. The gentleman must keep in mind that there is an unemployment trust fund and a reserve account and then the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. ENGEL. That is very true; but this $32,000,000,000 you are talking about——

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. That is a reserve account and the farmer is not paid out of that under the old-age benefits. The farmer is not taxed under title VIII and is not taxed under title IX, and as I understand the gentleman, he agrees that they should be exempted.

Mr. ENGEL. He is not taxed directly, but if that tax is passed on to the consumer, as it always is——

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. ENGEL. If that tax, as every other tax, is passed on to the consuming public, the farmer, constituting 40 percent of the consuming public, is going to pay 40 percent of this tax which is going to be passed on to him; 40 percent of this tax of $32,000,000,000 reserve fund or trust fund is $12,800,000,000, and I would like to know how you are going to get around that.

When an individual is sick, the doctor leaves a bottle of medicine and says, "Take a teaspoonful every 2 hours and you will get well." The patient gets well, but every once in a while some fool comes along and swallows the whole bottle and dies. Some of these social reforms are all right, and I am in favor of them. If we take a spoonful at a time, we might get well; but I am wondering what will happen if we swallow the whole bottle. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DUNCAN].

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Chairman, Dr. SIROVICH has just suggested to me that I state to the gentleman who just preceded me that it is sometimes necessary to try several kinds of medicine before you can find out what is wrong with a patient, and it might be necessary to give him a dose of each kind.

I do not think I have ever observed quite as much pessimism in all my life concerning the future of this country as I observe here today coming from our friends on the other side of the aisle. I am certainly glad that it is not catching. My friends over here are very much like the Arkansas traveler. When the sun is shining they do not need any roof on the house and when it is raining they cannot put one on.

I think if we are going to get anything out of this depression, the experiences we get ought to enable us to look into the future and make plans to prevent another one.

With respect to old-age pensions, I think every man and every woman in this House is agreed that we are going to have them. You know, I think the most unfortunate thing that has happened to this country is the fact that the hopes and aspirations of the old people have been built up to believe that they are going to get a lot of money, which every man who thinks sanely upon the question knows they are not going to get. The letters we get from the old folks in our districts are pitiful. They believe honestly in their hearts that they are going to get $200 a month or $100 a month.

Mr. McGROARTY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNCAN. Gladly, sir.

Mr. McGROARTY. On what do you base your prophecy that they are not going to get it? What do you know about it?

Mr. DUNCAN. On the fact that this Congress is not going to pass such legislation, either now or at any time in the future.

Mr. McGROARTY. How about the next Congress?

Mr. DUNCAN. The next Congress is the same way.

Mr. McGROARTY. How do you know?

Mr. DUNCAN. And for one, I want to say to the gentleman that I think the Membership of this House is not going to sacrifice the financial structure of this country upon the altar of political expediency. [Applause.] I believe this to be true. I think the Membership of this House is still thinking soundly and is not permitting itself to be carried away by any of the visionary schemes that are being suggested to bring us out of this depression.

We must all recognize that because of the depression there are thousands and thousands of old men and old women in this country who have lost their savings, who have lost their jobs and never again will they be able to have employment. I am one who does not believe the Government owes to any man a living, but it does owe to him the right to make a living for himself, and when the Government finds itself in the position where, through its own short-sightedness, he is not able to make a living, then we do owe him something and we are going to have to take care of him.

If you have an old-age-pension law that is national in its scope, and by that I mean exclusively financed by the Federal Government, it must apply everywhere alike, and every man in this House today realizes that conditions differ in different parts of the country. They differ in the different communities of your own States, or in different portions of your own States. I for one have long advocated an old-age-pension law of some kind, and I honestly want to see one passed and I want to support one here that can become a law. This bill can become a law and I think the Membership of this House is in the temper to pass it. I am comparatively new in the Congress. I am a new member on the committee that has worked on this bill for 11 long weeks.

The method of preparing the bill has been discussed by gentlemen on the other side of the House. I do not think there has been a bill come into the House since my Membership to which the committee has given more thought and made more changes in the bill than in this. It comes to you after weeks of labor and thought, the best that the members of that committee could work out.

The plan of old-age pensions will enable the States to determine their own problems. My own State is in the same situation that many others are in. It is difficult to get money, it is difficult to collect taxes, but they are paying the money for relief that can be used for pensions.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNCAN. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Is this the Wagner-Lewis bill?

Mr. DUNCAN. This is the Wagner-Lewis bill, now the Doughton bill. Mr. LEWIS and Mr. DOUGHTON introduced the bill in the House, and these different bills were taken up by the committee, and we have spent 11 weeks considering all of them, and this is the result of that labor.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNCAN. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. After 30 days hearings on these different bills, we went into executive session, and after weeks of consideration of other bills this H. R. 7260 was introduced, after we had made 13 different drafts.

Mr. DUNCAN. That is correct; and this bill is the result of that labor. After the consideration of these bills this was worked out.

Now, there is one provision of the unemployment insurance that I do want to discuss. A number of the States now have unemployment laws. It is fundamental to me that we cannot have unemployment-insurance laws in this country unless it is national in scope. You must place the States on a basis of equality in the matter of taxation, so that if one State fails to have unemployment insurance and a neighboring State does have unemployment insurance the industry in the State that does have such laws will not be penalized because of the fact. So the tax has been placed on all industry alike. So it will cause the employers and the employees to demand the passage of such laws, as they ought to do.

Do you know your Uncle Sam has outgrown his pants and we are obliged to make a new suit of clothes for him?

Some have gone along not knowing of any change in the economic conditions. They do not realize the changes that have come to us—that we are living under changed economic conditions. They sit at their desks and think that we are going back to the old order of things. If they continue, we will go on further and further into the depths of depression. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include therein a statement by Dr. E. E. Witte.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object. I shall not object to any ordinary statement that my colleague wishes to make but I should to the inclusion of statements made by people not in any way connected with the hearings.

Mr. DUNCAN. May I say to the gentleman that the statement I refer to is now in the report of the committee and it concerns the Townsend old-age-pension plan.

Mr. TREADWAY. Oh, the gentleman is making an extract from the committee hearing?

Mr. DUNCAN. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. That is satisfactory. I did not understand.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DUNCAN. Dr. Edwin E. Witte, executive director of the Committee on Economic Security, made an analysis of the Townsend plan which I think is of interest, and is as follows:

COSTS

The Townsend plan proposes that pensions of $200 per month shall be granted to all citizens of the United States who are 60 years of age or over, other than habitual criminals, and who will forego all gainful occupation and agree to spend the pensions during the month in which they are received. No income or property limitations whatsoever are prescribed; even millionaires would be entitled to the Townsend pensions.

There were 10,385,000 persons over 60 years of age in the United States in 1930, as shown by the census of that year. At this time the number is considerably greater, being estimated at 11,562,000. The number of habitual criminals among the aged is very small and the number who are not citizens only about 600,000. While 4,155,495 persons over 60 years of age were in 1930 still "gainfully occupied", the great majority of these persons would gladly forego gainful occupation and agree to spend their pensions each month as received if they were assured a pension of $200 per month. Even if one-fourth of all now gainfully occupied would refuse the pensions, the total number of the pensioners under the Townsend plan would still approximate 10,000,000. This is the figure for the number of pensioners most commonly given in the Townsend literature, although sometimes 8,000,000 is stated as the number to be pensioned.

If there are 10,000,000 pensioners, the cost is $2,000,000,000 per month, or twenty-four billions per year, if there will be only 8,000,000 pensioners, these figures would be reduced to $1,600,000,000 per month, or $19,200,000,000 per year. Either figure is considerably more than double the present combined Federal, State, and local taxes, which in 1932 totaled only $8,212,000,000. (Source: Annual Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, 1933, p. 306, and the report of the United States Census Bureau, Financial Statistics of State and Local Governments, 1932, p. 9.)

These figures would represent the costs only in the first year. Persons who reach age 60 still have more than 15 years of life ahead of them on the average. Under the Townsend plan the average pensioner would be entitled to $200 per month for more than 15 years. Actuaries employed by the committee on economic security have computed that merely to pay pensions to those now 60 or over represents a cost to the Government of a present value of $245,000,000,000, which is to be compared with a total estimated public and private debt of $126,000,000,000 at the peak of the boom period in 1929. (Source: The Internal Debts of the United States, by Evans Clark, p. 10.) This total almost equals the entire estimated taxable wealth of the United States, which the report on Double Taxation in 1932 of a subcommittee of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives in the Seventy-second Congress, second session, page 294, places at less than $260,000,000,000, and is 50 percent greater than the actual assessed value of all property, found by this subcommittee to be $163,000,000,000.

As the plan contemplates that not only shall pensions of $200 per month be paid to those now 60 and over but also to all persons as they become 60, the actual liability assumed by the Government is much greater than this staggering total of $245,000,000,000.

For many years to come the number of pensioners will increase each year, and the annual cost and total liability will mount rapidly.

TAXES

To finance the Townsend pensions, the McGroarty bill (H. R. 3977), which is the official Townsend-plan bill, provides that a 2-percent tax—which may be reduced by the President to 1 percent or increased to 3 percent—shall be levied "on the gross value of each business, commercial, and/or financial transaction", to be paid by the seller.

In the Townsend literature the claim is made that the total money value of all transactions in 1933 was 1,200 billion dollars, and the Fifty-fifth Statistical Abstract of the United States is cited as authority for this statement. The page where this information appears, however, has never been given, and a careful examination of the Fifty-fifth Statistical Abstract of the United States indicates that no figure for the total money value of all transactions appears anywhere in the volume. The nearest approach to such a figure is the total of all bank debits, representing the total of all business transactions in which bank checks, drafts, etc., are used, in the 141 principal cities of the country, which in 1933 was $304,769,000,000. (Source: Statistical Abstract of the United States, 1933, p. 254.) It is estimated by Mr. Horbett, of the Federal Reserve Board, that the debits of all banks outside of the 141 principal cities are one-third of those in these cities. On this assumption, the total of all bank debits in 1933 was $442,000,000,000, while, roughly representing the total of all "business, commercial, and/or financial transactions", not all of this amount will be taxable under the Townsend plan, as it specifically exempts "salaries for personal services." Allowing for this exemption, approximately $400,000,000,000 of transactions would have been taxable in 1933. At the 2-percent rate in the McGroarty bill, this tax would have yielded $8,000,000,000, or about one-third the amount needed for the Townsend pension. A rate, not of 2 percent or 3 percent, as provided in the McGroarty bill, but of 6 percent is indicated as necessary for the payment of the Townsend pensions on the basis of 1933 money value of all transactions.

Even a 2-percent rate on the money value of all business, commercial, and financial transactions, to say nothing of a 6-percent rate, is so heavy that it would stop all business and could not possibly be collected. It would mean a tax of 2 percent of the face value of every check written in the course of ordinary business transactions. It would apply to manufacturers' sales, wholesalers' sales, and retail sales, and for nearly all commodities would represent a duplication of taxes, which, inevitably, would have to be added to the price paid by the consumers. In glassware, for instance, 11 transactions are customary between the producer of the raw materials and the consumer. On all of these transactions there would be a 2-percent or 3-percent tax, and at each stage something more than the tax (to allow for investment and handling charges) would be added to the price.

Such increases in prices would have a pronounced tendency to restrict purchases. Many other types of transactions would be rendered entirely impossible, while in the Townsend literature the claim is repeated time and again that a very large part of the entire cost of pensions would come from the sale of stocks and bonds, the probable effect of a tax of 2 percent (or 3 percent) on the money value of all sales of securities would be to close all stock exchanges, since the margin at which business is done on these exchanges is much less than 2 percent. A tax of 2 percent on the money value of all transactions would dry up the sources of revenue and would probably produce much less than the $8,000,000,000 per year indicated as the probable yield on the basis of the 1933 business of the country. In fact, it is doubtful whether such a heavy tax could be collected at all.

ADMINISTRATIVE PROBLEMS

Aside from the difficulties of collecting three times the amount of the Federal, State, and local taxes combined (which, as noted, would require a tax rate not of 2 percent but of 6 percent on the money value of all business, commercial, and financial transactions) the Townsend plan involves other great administrative difficulties. It provides that all sellers shall be licensed by the Secretary of the Treasury. The Bureau of the Census in 1933 had a record of 2,359,497 establishments engaged in manufacturing, wholesale and retail trade, hotels, service industries, and places of amusement, and this is by no means the entire number of sellers who would have to be licensed and from whom taxes would have to be collected monthly. Provisions would also have to be made for up-to-the-minute lists of pensioners and their identification, to prevent frauds. Under the McGroarty bill further local pension boards would have to be set up in each of the 3,071 counties, and approximately 3,500 wards in cities of the country.

Most difficult of all would be the necessary checking to see that the 10,000,000 pensioners all spent their $200 within the month in which received. This would require going into the private affairs of the pensioners to an extent never before attempted, and would necessitate a vast army of additional Government employees.

FINAL APPRAISAL OF PLAN

The Townsend advocates base practically their entire argument on the "revolving" feature of their plan. If there does not result from the plan a very great increase in incomes and in the money value of transactions, the promised pensions cannot possibly be paid for any length of time without wholesale inflation. The total income of all of the people of the United States in 1933 was only $46,000,000,000. The people who are over 60 years of age are less than 9 percent of the entire population of the country. The Townsend proposal consequently might be described as a plan under which more than half the national income is to be given to the less than 9 percent of the people who are over 60 years of age. Unless there is a very great increase in the national income, this could be done only through reducing the incomes of the people under 60 years of age by approximately one-half.

The Townsend advocates claim that such a result will not be produced, because business will be enormously stimulated through placing such a large amount of money in the hands of the old people to spend within the month in which received. They say nothing about the fact that the people under 60 will have approximately the same amount less to spend, as they will have to pay in taxes the amount which the people over 60 will get in pensions.

The Townsend literature states that the United States Government would have to pay only the $2,000,000,000 required for the first month's pensions and that the plan would thereafter be self-sustaining, because it would create enough new business to return to the Government the entire pension costs without burdening the taxpayers. As the rate of tax proposed is only 2 percent, it is manifest that the $2,000,000,000 paid out in the first month would have to increase to one hundred billion during that month to justify the expectations of the Townsend advocates. The Townsend plan contemplates that pensioners shall spend their money within the month in which received—that is, that all of the pension money shall be turned over once during the month—but in order to produce sufficient revenue to pay the pensions of the second month, without burdening the people under 60, there must be 50 turnovers of the pension within the first month.

Even the Townsend advocates acknowledge that this is impossible, but they are reduced to the dilemma either of burdening the people under 60 with heavy taxes, which will greatly reduce their incomes, or of having the Government pay the pension costs for a much longer period than the first month. Since it is inconceivable that the people under 60 would submit to have their incomes reduced by one-half, the latter course is the only possibility. This will mean a rapid increase in the national debt and, in effect, pronounced inflation.

Through inflation it may be possible to keep up the pension payments for some time. The final result, however, cannot be in doubt. The inflation and duplicate taxation involved in the Townsend plan will cause prices to soar, and soon, even with $200 per month, the pensioners will not be better off than they were before, while those below 60 will be immeasurably worse off. The Townsend plan is one which involves not only revolving pensions but revolving taxes. It is a plan which arouses great hopes, but actually will give the old people little or nothing.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER].

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I am very much delighted to know there are so many students of Jeremiah in this body. I did not know it before. It does seem to me that we ought to face this question as a real current matter of very great importance. It seems to me we ought to view this as a great step which the American people have had a right to take for many years past, and that we are just now seeking to take it. Naturally, there would have been, and there has been, a very great divergence of opinion as to how to go at this thing, how far we should go, and what will be the result, whichever way we did go. In 1913, as a member of the State Senate of Illinois, I had the great pleasure and honor to put forward in that body an old-age-pension bill. The bill failed because the people of Illinois were not ready for it at that time. The first session that I came into this body I became a member of the Labor Committee, and I put forward an old-age-pension bill which came before that committee. That bill provided for $30 a month.

When this session came upon us I did another piece of work that I want to put on record here. Having learned from long experience with hearings before the Labor Committee during the past two sessions that we were not thoroughly together on our ideas of what part the State ought to bear and what part the Nation ought to bear, the first thing I did was to write to every Governor of every State in the Union. I received 30 answers from 30 Governors within the first 10 or 15 days.

I turned those letters over to Dr. Witte, Chairman of the President's Committee on Welfare, which was working on this bill at that time. It will be of interest to note that of the 30 answers I received, 28 specified in their belief that $30 a month was the best figure. One advocated $40 a month, as the amount that ought to be paid, and one said that no amount whatever ought to be paid. The remaining answers, or several of them, came in after that and were turned over to that committee; but of the first 30 alone I kept account. I was convinced, therefore, that the amount that many of us had thought of was correct, because most pension bills put forward had been to that extent alike; and why? For this simple reason: To my mind the first thing to do when studying a bill which we hope to become law is to find out what we can do for a certainty, and then when our experience has increased, when we know we can do better, then go ahead and do better.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. Yes; certainly.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Certain gentlemen have objected to the burden upon employees in the payment of 3 percent in 1945 to secure old-age benefits. As I recall, the gentleman was a leader in the fight to secure retirement benefits for the railroad workers of this country.

Mr. KELLER. Yes, sir; that is true.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I would like to have his opinion as to whether or not the workingmen of the country would appreciate the opportunity to build up a fund for old-age benefits.

Mr. KELLER. I thank the gentleman for the question, because it has a bearing here, and it ought to be considered in this body at the present time. I think I received no less than 50,000 letters from the railroad workers all over the United States, and to say that they were unanimous in the opinion that they ought to have the right to build up an old-age-retirement fund is entirely within the truth. They did stand for that, and they do stand for it now. Not only that but we found also that the railroads themselves had been establishing railroad pensions all over the country, and that 90 percent of the entire mileage was already paying a pension of some kind. So we did the thing that occurred to us as being rational at that time. We divided the burden as you have divided it, as I understand it, in this bill. We put on industry, on employers, a two-thirds burden, and put one-third on the men, and that ought to be fair, because that is the way it figures out in practice.

But we are going to go much further along that line; it seems to me that anyone who studies clearly and uses his vision cannot doubt that at all. We are going further, and we are going to take many steps of which this is just the first one, and the political party that fails to see that will not get back, even in 1970.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. Surely.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I think the gentleman deserves a great deal of credit for having introduced an old-age-pension bill 22 years ago. Did that bill provide for paying $30 out of the National Treasury?

Mr. KELLER. The bill was presented 22 years ago in the State Senate of Illinois and was for a State old-age pension.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Then the gentleman introduced one here?

Mr. KELLER. Yes. The bill I introduced here was purely a national old-age-pension law in which the Government should pay the entire amount.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Out of the National Treasury?

Mr. KELLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I agree with that.

Mr. KELLER. I am going now to disagree with myself upon that.

I am going to say that the committee has done a wiser thing than I had sought to do, though we are looking at the same subject with the same object in view. That is this: I was perfectly willing that the Government should pay, but when I came to study it over I had to agree that as a matter of organization, the people in the locality know what ought to be paid to the different ones better than any possible Government agency. As I understand it, that is the view of the committee, and I think it is a wise view. I think it is the only rational thing to do.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. Certainly.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Should not all American citizens be treated alike?

Mr. KELLER. I agree with the gentleman, because, let me confess, I am a nationalist, broadly speaking, but I must, nevertheless, understand and keep in mind that there is a reason for the existence of the States and their sovereignty as it has existed. I am not going to overlook that fact. I must hold that in mind as a matter of plain, ordinary horse sense.

Mr. COLDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. Gladly.

Mr. COLDEN. As a student of old-age pensions for many years, I would like to ask the gentleman if he believes there is a relationship between the amount that can be paid and the national average or per capita income?

Mr. KELLER. Oh, yes; there is no question about that. Answering that, I want to say further that I took up with Dr. Witte, head of the President's committee, which worked out much of the information these gentlemen have had the pleasure of using, the proportion that the Government ought to pay. I wrote him insistently saying that in my judgment the Government should pay 75 percent instead of 50 percent. When I was told that the administration would stand for 50 percent and probably no more, I made this suggestion, and I want to suggest it to the committee. That is, that at the beginning, we will say, while so many of the States are in practical bankruptcy, the Federal Government should pay 75 percent and let the States pay 25 percent; and then reduce the amount which the Government pays and increase the amount which the States pay during a series of years, according to what we think is good judgment.

I want to say to you here if this body does what I believe it will do, we are not going to get excited over any part of this pension bill. We are not going to quarrel over nonessentials. We are not going to mix the thing, as has been done to a remarkable extent by the speakers who have preceded me, especially on the Republican side. We are not going to submit to any mixing of the facts in this case. We are going to insist, I am sure, on keeping the record entirely straight, in thinking this thing straight through. The reason I am speaking of that especially is this: I have, as you all know, been against what we call "gag rules", and I am going to remain against them, because I have said from the beginning that I have never seen a bill pass this body under a gag rule that would not have passed this House under the most liberal possible rule, and to the advantage not only of this body itself, to its dignity and to its duty, but to the very great advantage of the American people, because, after all, if you think the American people are not following the doings of this body you had better guess again and wake up. They are studying what we are doing. They are reading what we are saying here. They are forming opinions of what we express, and about us from our consideration of them.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I realize the gentleman is an authority on the question of old-age pensions and unemployment insurance. I call the gentleman's attention to the testimony of Miss Perkins before the Senate Finance Committee at page 117, as follows:

Senator BLACK. Miss Perkins, I want to ask you one or two questions. Senator COUZENS brought up the question as to the imposition of contribution on the people at work. Is it not true that the tax employed under the bill necessarily is, in the main, a tax on the people at work?

Secretary PERKINS. Well, it will not be collected directly from them.

Senator BLACK. Certainly.

Secretary PERKINS. You mean, sir, I suppose, that it can be translated into the price?

Senator BLACK. Most of the consumers of consumable goods, are they not the people of low income?

Secretary PERKINS. Yes, sir.

Senator BLACK. Then is it not true that under this tax, as imposed, it will, in the main, be loaded upon those who purchase consumable goods and therefore will, in the main, be loaded upon those with smaller incomes?

Secretary PERKINS. Yes, sir.

What is the gentleman's opinion about that?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman read the next two sentences?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Certainly. [Reading:]

Senator BLACK. Then is it not true that up to that extent it does not increase the aggregate purchasing power of the Nation?
Secretary PERKINS. I think it will increase the purchasing power.

Does the gentleman want me to read further?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman is a good reader.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. It does not modify what I read at all.

Mr. KELLER. I think there is no question but what Miss Perkins answered entirely correctly. I do not think there is any dispute in the minds of the Members on that subject. What I am trying to do most of all is to keep this thing perfectly clear in mind. I am talking mostly, as you understand, for a direct old-age pension. I have very specific ideas on the possibility of unemployment insurance. My honest belief is that there is only one possible effective unemployment insurance, and that is the guarantee of a job for every man and woman who wants to work. That is my opinion of it, but I am not injecting that here, because I am going along with this bill. This same idea that we are putting forward here has been tried already in a number of countries with some success; not a lot of success, but some success. I think the United States is going to step forward, far ahead of any other country along that line, within the very next few years.

I am glad to see this step taken, however.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield.

Mr. HOUSTON. Does the gentleman know what percentage of the pay roll is required to build up this fund for future unemployment insurance or old-age pensions?

Mr. KELLER. I have not studied that matter sufficiently to answer the gentleman directly. I think if the gentleman will study the hearings he will find it explained much better than I can give it. I would not like to answer a question I have not studied specifically.

Mr. HOUSTON. Who pays this, may I ask?

Mr. KELLER. As I understand it two-thirds is paid by industry directly and one-third by the man who receives the benefits.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 additional minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield.

Mr. HEALEY. For the purpose of the RECORD will the gentleman, if he has the information, kindly state how many States now have old-age pension laws in effect?

Mr. KELLER. Twenty-eight States now have old-age pension laws, but they are just like my State. We have pensions for the blind and pensions for widows, but we are not paying them, and it is for that reason I say now that the Federal Government ought for the next 4 years to pay a minimum of 75 percent so as to induce the States that are hard up, and Illinois is hard up, to resume payments and other States to begin the system. I believe it would be a very great incentive. Does that answer the gentleman's question?

Mr. HEALEY. May I ask one further question?

Mr. KELLER. Certainly.

Mr. HEALEY. The enactment of this legislation will assist those States which are actually paying old-age pensions.

Mr. KELLER. Of course it will, and it will help the others that have not enacted such laws to enact them.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Is it not a fact that this is the first administration and the first Congress that has taken any step at all so far as national assistance is concerned in the direction of old-age pensions?

Mr. KELLER. Of course it is.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Other administrations have made the State carry this whole burden, which we all know is a heavy burden and which, if it is to be universally applied, must have a national set-up and Federal help.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman from North Carolina, the Chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, which wrote and reported this social-security bill, that if this bill becomes a law, and it will become the law, the gentleman has connected his name with a thing that will bring such fame to him as he at the present time does not dream of. [Applause.] That is true, gentlemen. I am not handing an empty compliment to the Chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. This is the first step, and it is a great step and a wise step, but it is not the only step, for we shall take more as we go along.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. If this bill is enacted into law in its present form, will it provide pensions for those people who have attained the age of 65, but who have not contributed to the fund?

Mr. KELLER. Yes, certainly. The old-age feature of the bill is just a plain, straight-out old-age pension. We are mixing here, of course, old-age pensions and old-age benefits; but the old-age-pension feature, I may say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, is just a plain, straight old-age pension right straight out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. When will the payment of these pensions begin if this bill is enacted into law?

Mr. KELLER. It goes into effect the 1st day of July, as I understand it, but it actually goes into effect on the 1st of January, as soon as the set-up, the organization can be gotten together and arrangements made to administer the law, and the names of those eligible have been gathered. It will be a New Year's gift to the old people of America from Uncle Sam.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for one further question?

Mr. KELLER. I yield with pleasure to my colleague on the Labor Committee.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Will the citizens of those States that do not provide pensions themselves derive any benefits under this act?

Mr. KELLER. Not until those States pass appropriate laws.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Suppose those States should refuse to pass legislation granting pensions, what would happen?

Mr. KELLER. The citizens of those States at the next election would vote against incumbent officials, and put in other officials who would pass such legislation; there is no question about that.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. I believe the real solution of the problem would be for the Federal Government to pay adequate old-age pensions regardless of what the States may do.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Is not the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania an added argument in favor of the Government paying these pensions?

Mr. KELLER. I may say to the gentleman I suggested that, of course.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Just one other short question. President Green, of the American Federation of Labor, described the Wagner-Lewis bill as pitiable and utterly inadequate. Will the gentleman say that this characterization applies to the Doughton bill?

Mr. KELLER. I do not think so.

Mr. LUNDEEN. It is a different bill.

Mr. KELLER. The truth of the matter is that in my last campaign I made speeches all the way along the line for an old-age pension, and I stood for $30 a month. I have not yet received a single letter from the large number of aged people in my district objecting to that. They are all only too glad to think they are going to get it.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. The gentleman stated that 28 of the States pay $30 a month old-age pension. Is that about what they think the Government can carry out?

Mr. KELLER. That is true, of course, but the States have not specified that in their laws. Twenty-eight out of 30 of the governors of the States to whom I wrote to get a cross section of State administration views on the whole matter gave me as their opinion that $30 was the most practical amount and that the Federal Government should pay from 50 to 75 percent, and some went even as high as 80 percent.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. KELLER. I am anxious to continue with my statement, but I yield for a question to another of my colleagues on the Labor Committee. Make it a straight question, please.

Mr. WOOD. I wish the gentleman would tell me wherein William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, has testified before any committee that the Wagner-Lewis bill is a pitiably inadequate bill.

Mr. KELLER. I do not know.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Further extending the observation of the gentleman from Minnesota, I believe it is but fair to say that in the statement of Mr. Green, the president of the American Federation of Labor, when he appeared before the Ways and Means Committee, in his remarks on the question of unemployment insurance which is contained in this bill under title III, he stressed two particular points:

One was that the funds should be pooled in the States and not allow company reserves, and that is carried forward exactly as he suggested here. The second point was that the amount of the excise tax should be levied upon the pay rolls to be paid by employers, and it is exactly provided in that manner in this bill.

Mr. KELLER. I thank the gentleman for his observation.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. TREADWAY. I want to clear up just a little uncertainty in my own mind as to the statement the gentleman made with reference to when any of these old-age payments will reach the individuals. I understood him to say very shortly.

Mr. KELLER. No. I stated the law would go into effect on the 1st of July, and it would take until about the 1st of January before the entire machinery is set up, and bring the money really into the hands of those who need it. That is my own judgment.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I call the gentleman's attention to two provisions in the bill? One is that an appropriation is authorized for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936. That is in section 1. Then in section 3 the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to make payments to States which have an approved plan for old-age assistance. In other words, the plan of the States must be approved by the Social Service Board before the States are eligible to receive Federal assistance.

Mr. KELLER. Certainly. It would make for chaos if it were not provided in that way.

Mr. Chairman, there are two bills I want to talk about, namely, the Townsend bill and the Lundeen bill. I am not excited about nor am I disgusted with either one. The truth of the matter is that I have read everything that has been sent to me on this subject, and that has been plenty, which would enlighten me. I have received many letters along this line, and I want to say that the Townsend bill as it first came before this body was, in my humble judgment, a wild plan. May I say to the gentleman from California [Mr. MCGROARTY], that since he has worked it over it can no longer be termed a wild plan. On the contrary, it is a very intelligent presentation of an idea. However, it is not an idea, in my judgment, that we are in position to accept at the present time because I believe we have to go to work and make money before we can pay out the money. It may be because of my lack of vision, but I do not see that by spending money in the way suggested in that bill that we will start things going.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. KELLER. For this reason, I have been fighting for the right to give men jobs in this country. When you put everybody to work and restore your national income to where it was in 1928 or 1929, prior to the panic on the New York Stock Exchange in October of 1929, then we are ready to look at some of these plans; then we are ready, Mr. Chairman, to consider providing what we might call an adequate pension out of this pension bill. We can do that after we have had experience. In my judgment, we are not ready to do that until we have put men to work, and until we have found out just what we can do.

The Lundeen bill is an idea, and it is a broad-gaged idea. It is an idea that is worth the time of any Member on this floor giving attention to, because I am not willing to say it might not hereafter become the ideal plan to be adopted by the American people when we have arrived at the place where we can consider it as a possibility. It does seem to me that we should pay this pension here provided for now, and increase the payment, if found to be inadequate, until the pension becomes adequate. That is the way American people do things.

Mr. Chairman, may I say in closing that we ought to keep our heads entirely clear. We ought to know that a vote for this bill, whether we can agree with all parts of it or not, is going to be a vote for the most forward-looking piece of legislation in the history of the American Government. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SAUTHOFF].

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Chairman, I am going to address most of my remarks to the gentlemen on the Ways and Means Committee, because I am in favor of this bill. As I have read it and studied it, however, I have come to the conclusion that there ought to be some changes, and I come before the Committee now in a spirit of friendly cooperation in order to try to do something constructive to aid the bill, not in an attempt to tear down the bill by vicious criticism that offers nothing in its place.

We of Wisconsin have had nearly every bit of this legislation in our State, some of it for 20 years, and we claim that we have the finest State in the Union, at least as far as social security is concerned. [Applause.] We challenge comparison with any other State in this respect. In fact, up to this year we were the only State in the Union that had unemployment insurance.

Mr. Chairman, these various social, economic, and industrial measures I have heard debated for 35 years in my State, and invariably the only argument that was ever advanced against such legislation was that it would destroy industry. We do not destroy industry and we never have destroyed industry in the State of Wisconsin. I well recall back in 1911 and the years immediately preceding when we had the fight for workmen's compensation. The same battle was waged against that measure that has been waged against all social-security legislation in our State, namely, that it would destroy industry in the State. Well, we adopted the Workmen's Compensation Act. We were called the "Guinea Pig State" and the State of experimental industrial legislation, but we have lived to see the day that not only the other States of the Union have adopted this legislation but the Federal Government in addition has also adopted it. [Applause.] Furthermore, we are better off today than the majority of our States. Not one child has been denied education because of lack of funds, and all this we have done without one dollar of bonded indebtedness. That is an exceptional record, especially in these difficult and trying times.

Mr. Chairman, I do not expect that this is going to be a perfect piece of legislation. My own personal experience, both in drafting legislation, in debating it, and in voting on it, has led me to the conclusion that no legislation is perfect when it is first passed. That is the common experience. We have to change all of the laws. We will have to change this bill if we pass it in its present form. As time goes on it will be improved with experience. Trial and error will point the way for us to take in the future. Coming generations will have different problems to meet in this respect, just as our problems differ from those of a previous generation. Let them deal with their problems when they face them, just as we are dealing with ours as we face them.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of passing this legislation, not because I believe it to be perfect, but because it is a beginning of a new era for the less fortunate and the under privileged.

My anxiety about this bill is this: It is a splendid forward step in the march of progress in social security, [Applause]. I want to keep on with that forward march just as long as we can possibly do so. I appreciate the fact that there are those who would prefer to pass only old-age pensions and discard all the rest of this splendid program. I am not unmindful of the fact that there are those who would pass only some legislation on unemployment insurance and discard all the rest of this program.

As far as I am personally concerned, the 9,000,000 children who come under this beneficial legislation are more important than either the old-age people or the unemployed, because we have taken care of the unemployed with the $4,880,000,000 work-relief bill. It now remains for us to make some substantial contribution to the future in securing not a temporary relief measure, but a definite, permanent, social-security plan, and this is it.

I now want to ask a few questions of the committee in regard to this matter and may I say to the members of the committee I have received two telegrams today, both from my home at Madison, Wis. One is from John Callahan, the superintendent of public instruction, addressed to me. He says:

> I am hoping for the passage of H. R. 7260, especially interested in title 5, parts 2 and 4.
> JOHN CALLAHAN.

Then this other telegram:

> Nine thousand, five hundred crippled children and over 14,000 physically-handicapped juveniles and adults in Wisconsin plead your help. Urge title 5, part 4 and part 2, relating to vocational rehabilitation and services for crippled children as included in H. R. 7260.
>
> W. F. FAULKES,
> State Supervisor, Vocational Rehabilitation.

Now, if the gentlemen of the committee will bear with me, I will try to get a little help from them in respect to some of the provisions that I think ought to be changed.

In the first place, I am not satisfied with the contribution of $50,000,000. I think it is utterly inadequate. I cannot lend myself to a program in this House, which has voted and will vote for $1,500,000,000 for the Army and the Navy and less than $100,000,000 for this entire social security set-up. This is why I say that in my judgment is it utterly inadequate and will not take care of the wants and the needs of those whom it seeks to help.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUTHOFF. I cannot refuse the gentleman, but I would prefer to continue.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I understood the gentleman was directing his questions to members of the committee.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. That is all right; go ahead, I yield.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I did not want to intrude upon the gentleman, but I understood him to say he wanted to direct his questions to members of the committee.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. That is correct and I yield.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. On that point I invite the gentleman's attention to the fact that 29 States and 2 Territories now have old-age-pension laws. The total amount that is used for all of these purposes is $31,000,000. Of course, this represents over one-half of the States of the Union. The best estimates of those who were in a position to know more about it than anybody else assured the committee that the sum of $50,000,000 for the first year, when we know that many of the State plans cannot be put into full operation, would be ample and sufficient to take care of that length of time.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. And, of course, in future years the gentleman will observe there is no limit set at all. The amounts necessary are here authorized to be appropriated.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

On page 3, lines 5 and 6, referring to the language in parentheses, I think the civil service is omitted there, and with respect to subsection (7) under (a), I have the feeling that in the case of homesteads there should be an exemption on homesteads for the benefit of the surviving spouse. It should not be possible, upon the death of the husband, to sell the homestead of the widow. Let her live in the old home the balance of her days.

On the next page, in lines 23, 24, and 25, beginning with "not counting" in line 23, and ending with "$30" in line 25, we ought to strike that all out of the bill. I am in favor of raising the amount and would make no limitation on the States, but permit them to provide more generously, and the Federal Government also.

This, of course, is a matter of personal opinion, but I have the feeling that $30 is not adequate, and secondly, I want to give the States all the possible help I can in passing their own legislation.

On page 9, line 4, beginning with "on the date he attains the age of 65", I feel there should be a limitation there restricting it to those who have retired, in order that it might bring out what I conceive to be one of the purposes of this bill, namely, by taking those that have attained the retirement age out of employment, so as to make room for others that need the work, and thereby create more employment by getting rid of those who retire.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Referring to the objection the gentleman had to the $50,000,000 appropriation, I might say that that is for the first year. The second year, the Federal fund would be $104,000,000, and in 1945, it goes to almost $450,000,000.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Yes, I understand that; I have read the report. Now, on page 14, in the exemption in subsection 7, I am somewhat concerned that the exemption of private industry plants might endanger the whole program. I say this because you can pass Federal legislation only on the grounds of interstate commerce or taxation, and such taxation must be uniform.

I want to refer to one thing more. On page 18, I want to ask this question. The 500,000 families now on relief will be eligible under this title, will they not?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. On page 20, line 20, you have one-third of the total amount expended. I am assuming, and I may be right or wrong—I am assuming that probably the original theory was that the Federal Government should supply one-third, the State one-third, and the county one-third. Was that the original idea?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. It may be done that way. In Wisconsin the average amount for each child would be $10.13. This would permit the amount to be increased to $15.13, with the Federal contribution of 50 percent paid by the State.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Here again I have the feeling that the amount is inadequate. Eighteen dollars per month for a young mother with a minor child is utterly insufficient to supply even the barest necessities of life, and I therefore feel that we should raise this amount to a sum sufficient to supply their needs, without forcing the young mother out of the home to earn enough to support herself and her baby.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HULL].

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, the Chairman of the Rules Committee warned yesterday that "there is going to be a day of reckoning for the people who are advocating this Townsend plan when our poor, distressed people wake up to the situation and find the snare and the delusion they have been drawn into."

At about the same hour a prominent official of the administration was testifying before a congressional committee, and in effect said that a law which fails of its purpose was worse than no law at all.

This so-called "security bill", if passed in its present form, will bring "the day of reckoning" to those who are playing fast and loose with the demand for old-age pensions. It will be another of the laws which so fail of their purpose that they are worse than no law at all. The bill covers unemployment insurance and other features which, if amended, may offer an excuse for its consideration. Its provisions as to old-age pensions are wholly insufficient, the appropriations are inadequate, and the results which will follow its enactment will be both insufficient and inadequate.

Regardless as to how people may differ as to the Townsend plan, or what may be their opinion of the original McGroarty bill, or of the new bill presented by Mr. McGROARTY which greatly modifies and changes the plan of the original measure, it must be conceded that the millions of people who have organized the movement are sincere in their advocacy of the plan, both as to the relief for the aged and the business recovery which they believe their measure will bring about. Along with other old-age pension organizations, they have been influential in forcing the issue into national attention, which they would not have been able to do but for deplorable situations which surround six or eight millions of old people, who, after giving their best years to the development of their Nation as well as to that of their home communities, now are facing the poorhouses or various emergency relief agencies in order to keep body and soul together.

In answer to the demand of the millions who have petitioned Congress for this form of governmental aid, this bill is offered. It purports, among other things, to provide national aid to States for old-age pensions. In fact, it merely seeks to reduce the present emergency-relief allowances by the Government by taking the aged and unemployable from the regular relief rolls and placing them on a new relief roll, and taxes the States for one-half the cost. It will empty no poor houses, it will not lessen the burdens of municipalities whose depleted treasuries have been so drawn upon during the depression, it will offer no assistance to a multitude of old folks who have labored long and earnestly to provide for their own declining years but who now, through no fault of their own, are unable to carry on.

This bill provides $49,750,000 for old-age benefits. It is expected that States will provide a like amount, bringing the total fund to $99,500,000. Divided among all the six millions who have attained the age of 65 years, the amount to each would be $16.58. Assuming that only one-fifth the number of people might desire to apply for old-age benefits the allowance would not exceed $82.90 per annum. And that would be the amount which both State and National Governments would be required to furnish under this measure. The bill would limit the allowance to $30 per month, but with the total appropriation at less than $100,000,000, not one-fourth that sum could be paid each individual. The bill, therefore, seems to indicate that a much smaller sum will be allowable.

The total appropriations for national expenditures at this session of Congress will exceed $9,000,000,000. There are still about $2,000,000,000 available for expenditure from the appropriations of the preceding Congress. The appropriation for work relief and business recovery is close to $5,000,000,000. Still, when 6,000,000 of our good people ask for a reasonable but adequate old-age-pension law, their demand is met with the proposal that they may have $49,755,000, and we are warned by the White House that the amount must not exceed that figure.

We are building a billion-dollar Navy. The profits which will go to the builders and those furnishing materials and munitions will be $200,000,000 or more. From the Senate investigation of the profits of munition makers and armament manufacturers it is likely that more than 20 percent of the cost of the billion-dollar Navy will go to the making of more millionaires. This bill would give only the amount which will be expended on a couple of warships for old-age pensions.

It is estimated that half the $4,000,000,000 about to be expended for work relief under the President's direction will go to the purchase of material for construction purposes. Under the provisions of the N. R. A. codes, there must be allowed a profit of at least 10 percent. Nobody believes that a mere $200,000,000 will be all the profits which will go to the great corporations which will furnish the steel, cement, machinery, and other purchases made for the construction program. Profits are conspicuous features in Government work.

The House has just passed a river and harbor bill for $162,000,000, which carries $59,000,000 for the improvement of a couple of canals, nearly $10,000,000 more than this bill provides for old-age benefits.

Recently a bill was rushed through the House adding $38,500,000 to naval appropriations, which will be expended for new buildings, drydocks, and, among other things, for palatial homes of naval officers at various points. From the P. W. A. funds allocated to the Navy by the President last year, over $119,000,000 are still available.

Under the relief program about $700,000,000 will be spent upon 600,000 young men in the C. C. C. camps the coming year. However laudable may be that expenditure, the funds to be spent will be 12 times as great as the appropriation in this bill for those of the 6,000,000 of aged people, who have lived, worked, and paid taxes for a lifetime and now are in dire need.

These are only a few instances of what the huge appropriations of this Congress will include.

The best feature of the bill before us is that it may be amended, drastically amended, if Congress wakes up to the problem and votes in the amendments. The total appropriations should be increased manyfold. The entire fund should come from the Federal Government. The requirement for State contribution should be eliminated. The amount of old-age benefits should be sufficient for its much-needed purpose. A nation that can spend billions for war preparations can and should be able to care for the aged and infirm.

The demand for old-age pensions cannot be met by bluffs and gestures. This bill is hardly either in its present form. [Applause.]

Mr. THOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. If I have time.

Mr. THOM. I call attention to the fact that under the law providing for the enlargement of the Navy the profits are limited to 10 percent.

Mr. HULL. In 1935 you had $38,000,000 for auxiliary cruisers. How much profit was there?

Mr. THOM. The law restricts profits to 10 percent.

Mr. HULL. The law is one thing, but the administration of it is another when you come to naval appropriations.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK].

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Committee, if you will permit me to finish my statement, and then get me additional time, we will open the whole matter for a free-for-all as far as questions are concerned.

Mr. Chairman, I trust this Congress will not adjourn until it has passed a comprehensive and effective old-age-pension law. There will be many plans before us, and the advocates of each will insist upon their method as the only method open to us. We need to have patience—we need to exercise a charitable attitude toward those who may disagree with the plan offered by someone else. Personally, I am an advocate of the McGroarty bill, known in this House as "H. R. 7154." In my judgment, the plan proposed in that bill is the best plan before the American people, and it was introduced in this House by one of the ablest men who ever was honored to sit in this Congress. Often I have heard some Member say, "This horrible, this visionary, this ill-considered Townsend bill." Members who are ignorant enough to say that, or make similar statements, are not to be censured but pitied. I trust I have sufficient training and experience in life as to prevent me from making any such rash statements concerning any bill intended for the relief of any class of our citizens. While an advocate of the so-called "McGroarty bill"—Townsend bill—I hope I have the good sense to keep an open mind throughout this debate and thus be in a position to exercise my best mental power to contribute my small part to the accomplishment of a long-delayed task—that of providing security for the aged of this country.

Just criticism of the bill before us is, no doubt, welcomed by the sponsors of the measure, but I hold that this criticism should be constructive and emanate from worthy motives, and not be brought forward in any spirit of ridicule or for the purpose of defeating the measure by methods that are unfair and unethical.

Personally, I feel the present bill will not give that security to the aged that we all hope for. My reasons are:

First. It seems to me we have appropriated enough under a system of selling interest-bearing Government bonds. The revenue to support the present bill provides for a general appropriation and will continue the same system of bond issue. We have now reached a point where the interest burden, public and private, is more than we can pay.

Second. The payments to old people, under this act, will be, prior to 1942, nothing more or less than a dole, and the recipients will still be objects of charity under a system that will permit only a bare existence.

Third. The present act is the most brazen attempt to submerge the sovereignty of State governments to the will of the General Government ever attempted in American history. Every State is compelled to pass laws such as will be approved by the board in control of payments under this act. Had any such attempt been made in 1861 to do the same thing this Government would not be known to the world today as the United States of America. Today we see the sovereign power of States disappearing entirely and the Federal Government reaching out in all directions to control the destiny of the American people. Why have any State legislature at all, if they must pass such laws as Congress and the executive branch of the Government shall direct? When will this tendency to overshadow State governments cease?

Fourth. The present act will not remove any of the aged from employment, for the payments under the act will not support the aged people now employed. This act will not create any new jobs for the unemployed, who are young and will work if they can secure work. This act will not remove the four million from relief, but will extend the same situation for years to come.

Fifth. This act creates another Federal bureau, with high-salaried administrators, who in all probability will be no more in sympathy with the needy than are the various directors and administrators of the multitude of Government set-ups handling relief today. It creates more Federal Government when we have enough as it is.

Sixth. This act will not place the purchasing power down in the grass roots, but will continue our present business policy of hand-to-mouth planning. It will not start the factories that are idle or bring a living price to those who produce raw materials. It will not restore business activity, but by bond issues will further increase the tax burden and further retard business.

WHAT THE M'GROARTY BILL WILL DO

First. It will lessen the crime wave, for the lack of opportunities and idleness, without legitimate incomes, is now known to be a major factor directly responsible for crime.

Second. It will stop the ever-increasing stream of unfortunates on their way to the insane asylums.

Third. It will close out every poorhouse in America.

Fourth. It will take 4,000,000 people over 60 off relief rolls.

Fifth. It will put 4,000,000 unemployed young people to work in the place of 4,000,000 old people now working.

Sixth. It will take 2,000,000 old people off private relief and ease the burden of their relatives who support them.

Seventh. It will start the buying power of the American people at the grass roots among the retailers, and from there back to the factories and producers. The demand for employment will increase. Factories will start, producers of raw materials will find a market for their products, the unemployed now on the outside of factories looking in for a job will have a job. The whole intricate business machinery of the Nation will start that has been paralyzed since 1920, and especially so in the East since 1929.

Eighth. To do this will cost the Government nothing.

Ninth. Relief will be in the hands of the aged and sympathetic instead of some hired and unsympathetic and scientific nuisance.

Tenth. It will drive out that fear of a fateful future which has weakened the minds of millions and has filled the poorhouses and the asylums.

Eleventh. It will be doing for our aged what this Government should have done in the very beginning of it.

Twelfth. Everyone seems willing to give their support to the conservation of our national resources, but we have forgotten the greatest resource of all—the fathers and mothers of this Nation. Our civilization and progress cannot be measured by our fields, our mines, our factories, our churches, our buildings; but it can be measured by the people who live here. Their condition in life should be the greatest concern of any system of conservation, and the condition of the aged and their treatment by the Government under which they have lived and which they have helped to build is the true test and standard of progress and civilization of this or any other Government.

Thirteenth. This act will not control the action of any State legislature, but leave the sovereign power of the States intact.

Fourteenth. This act will create no new bureaus or administrations, but will use the machinery which we now have.

Out of a class of 100 college graduates, graduating at age of 25, the amazing results are as follows at the age of 65: 3 are financially comfortable; 1 has become rich; 4 have accumulated partially enough to live on; 65 are day laborers or paupers or living on charity, public or private; 27 are dead.

It should be remembered that this group has had the advantage of special training, and therefore much more able to fight the battle for existence than those who have had no such advantage.

There are now four million 60 years or older on relief.

There are four million 60 years or over employed.

Those who are accepted for insurance, at 60, have a life expectancy of 15 years. This applies only to those accepted. Of all, at the age of 60, the life expectancy does not average over 6 years and 8 months.

There are approximately 10,000,000 of the age of 60 or over in the United States. There are, therefore, about 2,000,000 not employed and not on relief and probably supported by relatives. Their status is unknown.

The Townsend bill will put relief in the hands of our old people, with sympathy and understanding, instead of with administrations that are hired to do the work and who are cold-blooded and unsympathetic.

Our old people who have reached the age of 60 only have a life expectancy of a little less than 7 years, and after having worked nearly all their lives in building up our civilization, shall we in the future do as we have done in the past—turn them out to die neglected? Remember that 65 out of every 100 at age of 65 are day laborers or wholly dependent upon charity, either public or private. We condemn the Eskimos for murdering their aged parents, but have we not done the same thing under the cloak of modern civilization? We are not as honest as the Eskimos.

We have authorized the President to use $4,000,000,000 to create artificial jobs for the unemployed. These are forced jobs and when forced, much of such planning must necessarily be futile. Much of it will be unnecessary, and no matter if the work is planned to be of permanent value to the country, such forced work can never take the place of natural demand born by necessity. Many of the forced jobs will not spring from any necessity, arising from the natural development of our civilization, but will be born by that other necessity, temporary in character, immediate in demand, and without natural impulses, namely, the necessity of finding something for those to do who are out of work, out of relief funds, and in dire need of the necessities of life.

Turn half of this $4,000,000,000 into an old-age annuity fund, to start the Townsend plan, and our unemployment problem will be settled. The fund will be augmented by receipts from transactions, and each transaction will leave along in its path new employment, springing from natural causes, not artificial, and the advances made by the Government in cash will be returned. Let the President spend the four billion on artificially created jobs, and the Government will never be repaid, and the work accomplished will be of most doubtful permanent value to the country. I cite this, not in the hope of preventing the expenditure of the four billion by the President, for that has now been authorized. I cite it to show those who condemn the Townsend plan as visionary have plenty of material in the $4,000,000,000 work bill to keep their visionary tendencies under complete control.

If these old people on an average only have less than 7 years still to live, can we in this Congress justify ourselves in voting for a bill that shall take them off the public-dole system and put them right back on a pension dole? That is what the provisions of this administration bill means. Anyone knows that the payments provided for per month is not enough for any old person's maintenance under any standard of decency. They can exist on the dole, they can exist on less, but we are here today to break the chains that have bound us in the past to an ignorant, unhuman, and now unthinkable policy of dealing with the aged. We are here to give them what they should have had at the very beginning of this Government. Because of lack of vision the old have been sent to the poorhouses, to the asylums, and to their graves. We have missed the greatest human problem for which free governments are instituted.

We are here today to change the program—we are here not only to give the aged a new deal but new hope. We shall miserably fail in our duty should we be content with providing a fund for the aged that shall merely keep body and soul together.

With their few years yet to live, let us pass legislation that shall recognize their service to a great country. Let their remaining days—just a few days—be days of gladness, days of hope, days in which they can devote their time and declining energies, not in labor of the strong, but in acts of kindness to their friends, neighbors, and the community.

It seems that as the last few years have sped past, we have been so engrossed in the mad policy of making more money, more profits, collecting more interest, that we have forgotten how to live. Neighborly deeds immortalized by James Whitcomb Riley live only in the history of the past. The specter of want—something to eat, and a place to stay when we are old—has pursued our people relentlessly. It has produced in the minds of the old and in the minds of the young a constant and dreaded fear of the future. I personally cannot remember a time, since I was old enough to understand, but what that common dread, that specter of want has not pursued me. I can well remember when the song Over the Hills to the Poor House filled my eyes with tears, even when I was confident that I had the power to fight and overcome this dragon of want.

This mental attitude has had a devastating effect upon the American people generally. It has weakened minds, it has weakened the aged in their fight for existence. It has filled the poor houses, it has over-filled the asylums. When the young witness the treatment of the aged, under our present system, they know that soon they will be next, and this mental disturbance has dangerously affected the American mind. Today, if we attack this problem correctly, we can drive out this fear, we can destroy this dragon, we can establish clear minds, we can think of our neighbor, we can bring happiness and joy to ten million of our aged and hope to the young, and relieve the mental strain on our entire population. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT].

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include therein a short statement and a short bill in connection with that statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, we have had whatever there may be of two sides to this question. As you all well know, that great philosopher, Tom Reed, who at one time presided over this House, said it mattered not how thin a pancake might be, there were still two sides to it. And there are therefore two sides to this question as a whole. Much has been said in compliment of the eminent gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON], and I always have something to say in praise of him, the best I could say about any man, the fine courtesy he always exhibits to the Members, and the great patience shown here during his splendid explanation of the bill. Next we have the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], saying why he is against the bill. I am inclined to think that many who may be against the bill are against that portion of it which seems to be very much involved. We can go back to that immortal decision of the great jurist John Marshall, and find the genesis of this proposition which we have here. It was when he wrote into a decision the thing that made America great and powerful, and which stands as the reason today for America being the greatest country in the world. I refer to the decision where he removed the barriers between the States, providing for the free flow of all commerce between the Commonwealths of the Nation. That is something that the European nations have been, to emphasize the matter, too dumb to understand, except in the time of Napoleon when he made an attempt and lost his throne for doing so. So let us separate these measures. Let each be free from hindrance of any other and be considered on its own merits.

When we come to the question of evolving something new, I am reminded that it is about 40 years now since we passed the Interstate Commerce Act, and yet not a day passes but you have arguments between the brightest minds of America before that Commission, and nothing seems settled about traffic or about freight rates. I heard read in the Senate by Senator Aldrich a report on the Federal Reserve question some 20 years ago, and I thought that was about right, but it is not now what it was then. It was understood at that time that if you had a piece of commercial paper you could have it discounted, and when you got tired of paying 6-percent interest upon it you could redeem that piece of paper. You can no more do that than fly. The only way that you can get any money now is to offer gold dollars and get your wife and all your relatives to endorse your paper and put up your farm, and then you may have some difficulty in getting it.

There is no such thing as perfection of human wisdom, and however great the men may be who framed this bill, however great you may be who discuss it here today, you will find in every State where there is an important State law, or where we have application of the Federal law, that after it gets through the committee and through the House and the Senate and the conference committee and the Attorney General passes on it and the President signs it, and it gets down for real contact with the laws of Nature, that is where Nature unfolds the flaws. Hence, you do not have a perfect bill today. I would not be suspicious, I would not sound a note of that kind; I have too much respect for this House, and particularly its integrity, and I always challenge anyone who inveighs against this House and against its sincerity, much less its integrity.

But I have been in the legislative business so long that when I see such a righteous part of a bill relieving old women and men of the country, whose limbs are weakening under them and whose hands are palsied, connected up with an involvement of something else, I become suspicious. The same kind of a bill has been adopted by 28 States, for old-age pensions, and the reason they are not a howling success is that they do not have the money to put them into effect. The sentiment is there and the system is perfect enough. Yet you bring out a bill for old-age pensions, but hang something to it that makes me suspicious, as I say, for I learned long ago that there are more ways than one to kill a dog, and if that is what you are doing, then I ask you to shift your position, for it would be an outrage to imperil the old-age-pension bill. Can you not get through this old-age pension and save these people and let them dry their tears and take the burden from their souls without involving it with something else, even though there is virtue in that something? It will take you 20 years to work out to completeness this thing of guaranteeing the payment of wages, and we want old-age pensions now. Look how long it has taken in England, and yet see what a little thing it is. I am going to put this into the RECORD. Germany had compensation many years before we did, and after the British Parliament had worked at it from 1920 to 1925, this is what they have done. But if they can do that, it seems to me that we can solve this problem without involving it with old-age pensions. I am afraid that this thing may fall down on account of this involvement. Right in my own district we have the great Logan Iron Works and the Burnham Steel Works.

I have many personal friends who now, at a time when these institutions are silent, when no smoke curls from them and no flame is to be seen from them at night, who are receiving pensions from a fund accumulated over the years. When we go through the valleys at night there all is as silent as death. As the lady said here the other day, when you walk through one of those towns in New England where the mills have been shut down it is like going through a graveyard; and yet, as I say, notwithstanding that, I have friends up there who are receiving pensions from a fund accumulated over the years. That is the case in many institutions. To iron out the difficulty you will have as between employer and employee will take you some years. You have already passed here 20 major pieces of legislation. It took you 18 months to bring out any tariff bill that was ever brought before this House. It took 30 or 40 years to evolve the Interstate Commerce Act and 20 years for the Federal Reserve. It should have taken 2 years for every one of them, or 40 years, and you passed them all in 4 months, and you are bringing them all back to iron them out again. I hope the genius of direction and the understanding of legislation on the part of the gentlemen in charge of this bill will in some way separate that old-age-pension bill from the others; although I will take it all rather than see old-age pensions fail.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. FOCHT. Under the permission granted me to extend my remarks, I insert herewith the following bill and statement:

H. R. 7223

A bill to authorize the prompt deportation of habitual criminals and habitual aliens, to guard against the separation from their families of certain law-abiding aliens, to deport direct-action Communists, to relieve meritorious cases of deportation hardships, to further restrict immigration into the United States, and for other purposes

(7) Is a member of or affiliated with any organization which, or who believes in, advises, advocates, or teaches the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States, or the duty, necessity, or propriety of the unlawful assaulting or killing of any officer or officers (either specific individuals or officers generally) of the Government of the United States or of any other organized government, because of his or their official character, of the unlawful damage, injury, or destruction of property, or sabotage, or a doctrine which advocates the overthrow by force or violence of governments, constituted authority, or social order, existing in countries not under the control of Communists or Fascists and the establishment in place thereof of a regime termed "proletarian dictatorship" or "National State Socialist" or "Totalitarian" State or a system based upon common ownership of property and abolition of private property, provided that the platform, program, or objectives of the Third Internationale, or the Fascist Grand Council, or National Socialist Labor Party, or Communist International shall be held to embrace the said doctrine.

SEC. 2. That from and after July 1, 1935, the quota in the case of any nationality for which a quota has been determined and proclaimed under the Immigration Act of 1924, as amended, shall be 20 percent of such quota, but the minimum quota of any nationality shall be 100. From and after July 1, 1935, no immigration visas shall be issued under subdivision (c) of section 4 of the Immigration Act of 1924 (U. S. C., title 8, sec. 204), but all the provisions of the immigration laws shall be applicable to immigrants born in any of the geographical areas specified in such subdivision as if each of such areas had at that time a quota equal to 20 percent (but not less than 100) of the number of nonquota immigration visas issued, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, to immigrants born in such area: Provided, however, That reciprocal arrangements may be entered into by the Department of State and the Department of Labor with the Dominion of Canada, Newfoundland, and Mexico whereby as many immigrants born, respectively, in those foreign territories contiguous to continental United States are admitted to the United States annually as persons born in the United States are annually admitted into their respective countries. Section 6 of the Immigration Act of 1924 (43 Stat. 153), as amended (U. S. C., Supp. VI, title 8, sec. 206), is amended to read as follows:

"(A) Immigration visas as to quota immigrants shall be issued in each fiscal year as follows: (1) 75 per centum of each nationality for such year shall be made available in each year for the issuance of immigration visas to the following classes of immigrants: (a) Quota immigrants who are the fathers or the mothers or the husbands by marriage occurring after January 1, 1933, of citizens of the United States who are 21 years of age or over; and (b) quota immigrants who are unmarried children under 21 years of age, or the wives, or husbands, or the mother or the father, of alien residents of the United States who were lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence.

"(2) Any portion of the quota of each nationality for such year not required for the issuance of immigration visas to the classes specified in paragraph 1 shall be made available in such year for the issuance of immigration visas to other quota immigrants of such nationality.

"(B) The preference provided in paragraphs 1 and 2 of subdivision (a) shall, in the case of quota immigrants of any nationality, be given in the calendar month in which the right of preference is established, if the number of immigration visas which may be issued in any such month to quota immigrants of such nationality has not already been issued; otherwise in the next calendar month."

SEC. 3. Section 7 of an act entitled "An act to further amend the naturalization laws, and for other purposes", approved May 25, 1932 (47 Stat. 166, sec. 7; U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 8, sec. 181), conferring on the Secretary of Labor a discretion to readmit any departed alien is hereby repealed.

SEC. 4. The Secretary of Labor may suspend for not more than 1 year the order or warrant or deportation of any alien subject to deportation under section 19 of the Immigration Act of February 5, 1919 (39 Stat. 889; U. S. C., title 8, sec. 155), and section 14 of the Immigration Act of May 26, 1924 (43 Stat. 162; U. S. C., title 8, sec. 214), provided such alien is of good moral character, has been in the United States 10 years, or has an American citizen wife, husband, child, or aged dependent parent lawfully resident in the United States. As to such suspension, the Secretary of Labor shall, on the date December 31 next following, report to the Congress all the facts and reasons therefor, and all appeals, petitions, protests, and recommendations of every kind and description in connection therewith; and the said Secretary shall, at the end of 6 months after the submission of such report, unless the Congress shall by act or resolution otherwise direct, promptly execute such order or warrant of deportation. If Congress cancels or rescinds any such order or warrant of deportation, the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization may accept any head tax therefor due and unpaid, may amend nunc pro tunc the entry record of the alien affected thereby so as to establish lawful entry for permanent residence, and may issue upon receipt of the fee required by law a certificate of arrival.

SEC. 5. Section 1 (a) (1) of the act of March 2, 1929, entitled "An act to supplement the naturalization laws, and for other purposes" (45 Stat. 512, ch. 536), which now reads: "(1) Entered the United States prior to June 3, 1921", is hereby amended, effective as of the date of this act as enacted, so as to read as follows: "(1) Entered the United States prior to July 1, 1924."

SEC. 6. The first sentence in section 21 of the Immigration Act of February 5, 1917 (39 Stat. 889; U. S. C., title 8, sec. 157), is hereby amended, effective as of the date of this act is enacted, so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 21. That any arriving alien, already having an immigration visa in accordance with the provisions of the Immigration Act of 1924 (43 Stat. 153), as amended, liable to be excluded because likely to become a public charge or because of physical disability other than tuberculosis in any form or a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease may, if otherwise admissible, nevertheless be admitted upon the giving of a suitable and proper bond or undertaking, approved by said Secretary, in such amount and containing such conditions as the said Secretary may prescribe, to the United States and to all States, Territories, counties, towns, municipalities, and districts thereof, holding the United States and all States, Territories, counties, towns, municipalities, and districts thereof harmless against such alien becoming a public charge."

SEC. 7. SEC. 8. Any employee of the Immigration and Naturalization Service shall have power to detain for investigation any alien who he has reason to believe is subject to deportation under this or any other act. Any alien so detained shall be immediately brought before an immigrant inspector designated for that purpose by the Secretary of Labor and shall not be held in custody for more than 24 hours thereafter unless prior to the expiration of that time a warrant for his arrest is issued.

SEC. 9. The Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, shall prescribe rules and regulations for the enforcement of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 10. The foregoing provisions of this act, with the exception of parts of sections 2 and 3 and all of section 6, are in addition to and not in substitution for the provisions of the immigration laws, including section 19 of the Immigration Act of February 5, 1917 (39 Stat. 889, U. S. C., title 8, sec. 155), and shall be enforced as part of such laws.

SEC. 11. Clause (B) of paragraph (1) of subsection (a) of section 6 of the Immigration Act of 1924 (43 Stat. 155), as amended (U. S. C., title 8, sec. 206 (a)), which grants to quota immigrants skilled in agriculture, their wives, and their dependent children under the age of 18 years, a preference within the quota, is repealed.

STATEMENT BY HON. BENJAMIN K. FOCHT, OF PENNSYLVANIA

(APR. 3, 1935)

After listening to the subversive testimony today before the House Committee on Immigration of which I am a member and realizing more than ever the need of additional immigration and alien-deportation legislation as well as its better enforcement and more efficient administration, I decided to revise and introduce a comprehensive bill along the lines of bills I have advocated for years and several bills now pending before the committee.

The bill I introduced goes farther than any other restriction and deportation bill by reducing existing quotas 80 percent, thus allowing 53,882 immigrant aliens to enter, the bulk of whom must be aged or near dependent relative of citizens or persons who have declared their intention to become citizens and who are legally and lawfully in our country. My bill will not only reduce existing European quotas 80 percent but will apply the quota-restriction system to countries of this hemisphere, to which existing quota-restriction laws leave our side and back doors wide open, and from which we have been getting thousands of aliens annually in spite of the administrative efforts of our foreign consuls and the Department of State in refusing visas to aliens they think might become public charges—an administrative restriction ordered by President Hoover and that ought to be put on the more permanent and American basis of definite law instead of the personal discretion of some administrative officer.

I left 20 percent of existing quotas for the humane reason of and have reserved the quotas largely for aged parents, husbands, minor children and other family relatives of persons already here lawfully and legally and who have either become cititzens or declared their intention to become citizens. Another humane exception my bill makes is with reference to aliens who came in between June 3, 1921, and July 1, 1924, during which perfect alien entry records are said not to have been kept or were possible. It is an exception urged by the American Federation of Labor and experts, and one that ought to do away with all reasonable objections to this needed legislation.

I feel very strongly that the Secretary of Labor has entirely too much discretion and is subjected to entirely too much pressure as a result of it by foreign blocs and certain selfish and certain internationalistic interests and influences. Last year under a discretion tucked in a naturalization law (May 25, 1932) that was never considered by the House except in a conference report, the Secretary readmitted reds like Emma Goldman to "lecture" and go about the country preaching anarchy. Not only was Emma Goldman, who had been deported with several hundred other anarchists in 1919, but other advocates of the overthrow of our Government by force and violence like John Strachey, Willie Musenberg, Henri Barbusse, and the like were admitted. My bill would repeal that discretion and revive the law making deported aliens inreadmissible.

Not only would my bill close up such discretionary loopholes but it contains word for word the bill the hearing was held on today, and would redeclare and tighten existing law making membership in organizations and political parties connected with the Third Internationale and seeking to overthrow our Government by force and violence a deportable offense. We have enough radicals of our own and enough unemployed and enough of our own dependents and even criminals and first general criminals without admitting another alien anarchist, pauper, or criminal; and the bill I have introduced would exclude and deport them, if enacted and properly enforced, and would also require habitual aliens here to get naturalized within the 5-year statutory period or get out. This provision of the bill would reach the several millions of aliens said to be here illegally and unlawfully because unless they are here lawfully they cannot get the necessary certificate of legal entry for naturalization.

The last census revealed over 14,000,000 foreign-born, over 6,000,000 aliens, and over 40,000,000 foreign-stock population, the largest in our whole history. No other country has any such liberal immigration laws. Each country should care for its own. Charity and unemployment should begin at home. Deportation is not imprisonment but the return of an alien to his or her homeland, where the chances are the alien has a better refuge and can get along better than here. Last year there was a 50-percent increase in alien stowaways and deserting alien seamen, a 50-percent increase in quota immigration, a 53-percent decrease in alien deportations, and every indication that the immigration tide has turned inward 163,904 aliens, an increase of nearly 10 percent over the previous year, having entered legally, and doubtless more than that illegally and surreptitiously under the existing relaxed administration of the law that is openly charged, and that the terrific drop in deportations and increases in alien stowaways, deserting alien seamen, and the like show. With over 12,000,000 unemployed and over 20,000,000 on relief, and with aliens leading strikes and the cause of riots like that last week in Harlem, New York City, and with our charities taxed to their very limit, it is time to think first of our own and tighten up the immigration-restriction and alien-deportation laws and bring about better and more efficient law enforcement.

Widows, orphans, and old-age pensions: Provision is made in the Widows', Orphans', and Old-Age Contributory Pension Acts of 1925 and 1929 for a contributory pensions scheme under which pensions are provided for widows, children, and elderly persons. This scheme is interlocked with the national health-insurance scheme, and, in general, an inclusive weekly insurance contribution is payable for both services together. Subject to certain conditions, the following pensions are payable, free from any restriction as to means: Widows, pensions of 10s. a week to the widows of insured men, together with allowances for children at 5s. a week for the eldest and 3s. for younger children. The children's allowances continue payable up to age 14 (or so long as school instruction continues but not beyond 31st of July following the sixteenth birthday). On remarriage, the widow's pension of 10s. ceases, but children's allowances continue. The widow of a man who died or reached the age of 70 before the scheme began on January 4, 1926, but who could have been insured for pensions purposes had the acts been in operation earlier may receive a similar pension when she reaches the age of 55. Orphans' pensions are 7s. 6d. a week, the period of the continuance being the same as for children's allowances. Contributory old-age pensions of 10s. a week at age 65 for insured persons, including wives of insured men who have themselves qualified.

Widows and contributory old-age pensions normally continue to age 70 and are then replaced by pensions under the Old-Age Pensions Acts, 1908 to 1924, free from the means and other restrictions which those acts impose.

The normal weekly contribution for national health and pensions insurance is 1s. 6d. for men and 1s. 1d. for women, of which

9d. and 6d., respectively, may ordinarily be recovered from the worker. In the case of workers aged over 65, contributions of 9d. (men) and 7d. (women) are paid by the employer only.

The total amount paid in Great Britain in respect of widows' and orphans' pensions for the year ending March 31, 1933, was approximately £21,800,000; the beneficiaries were 652,000 widows and 310,000 children (including orphans). The total number and cost of pensions paid under the contributory old-age pensions scheme (persons between ages 65 and 70) for the year ending March 31, 1933, was 648,000 (£17,767,000).

Unemployment insurance: This is administered by the Ministry of Labor, through the employment exchanges, trade unions, and by certain associations of employed persons. There are also special schemes in operation for the banking and insurance industries. The scheme is compulsory in its operation, and with the main exceptions of domestic servants in private service and persons employed in agriculture, substantially all persons covered by the health-insurance scheme are required to be insured against unemployment. The minimum insurable age is 16 years. Certain employees of Government departments, public or local authorities, railways and public-utility undertakings, and persons with rights under statutory superannuation schemes may also be excepted by their employers under certificates granted to the employers in cases where the Minister of Labor is satisfied that the employment is permanent in character, that the employees have completed 3 years' continuous service in that employment, and that the other circumstances of the employment are such as to make it necessary that they should be insured under the unemployment-insurance acts. A certificate of exemption, relieving him from liability to pay the employed person's share of the contributions, may be claimed by an employee who can prove that he is (a) in receipt of a pension or income of not less than £26 a year, or (b) ordinarily and mainly dependent upon some other person, or (c) ordinarily and mainly dependent on his earnings from an uninsurable occupation, or (d) employed in a seasonal occupation which does not ordinarily last for more than 18 weeks in any year and not ordinarily employed in any other insurable employment. The rates of weekly contributions are as follows: (a) Contributions at ordinary rates, man (aged 21 but under 65), from employer 10d., from employee 10d.; woman (over 21 but under 65), from employer 9d., from employee 9d.; young man (aged 18 but under 21), from employer 9d., from employee 9d.; young woman (aged 18 but under 21), from employer 8d., from employee 8d.; boy (aged 16 but under 18), from employer 5d., from employee 5d.; girl (aged 16 but under 18), from employer 4½d., from employee 4½d. (b) In the case of an exempt person, the employer's share only of a contribution is payable. No part of this contribution can be recovered from the exempt person. (c) Contributions in respect of persons of the age of 65 and over are payable by employers only, at the following rates: Man 10d., woman 9d. The ordinary State contribution is a sum equivalent to one-half of the joint contributions of employers and employed persons. Under the unemployment-insurance (national economy) order, 1931, the standard rates of benefit payable as from week commencing October 12, 1931, are: Men (aged 21 and under 65), 15s. 3d.; women (aged 21 and under 65), 13s. 6d.; young men (aged 18 and under 21), 12s. 6d.; young woman (aged 18 and under 21), 10s. 9d.; boys (aged 17 and under 18), 8s.; girls (aged 17 and under 18), 6s. 9d.; boys (aged 16 and under 17), 5s. 6d.; girls (aged 16 and under 17), 4s. 6d. Additional benefits at the rate of 8s. a week in respect of an adult dependent and 2s. a week in respect of each dependent child are payable in respect of certain classes of dependents. Under the unemployment-insurance (national economy) (no. 2) order, 1931, payment of benefit is limited to 156 days in a benefit year. Under the same order a scheme of transitional payments replaced the transitional benefit scheme. These payments are made only on proof of need, and the amount is determined by the public assistance authorities with the appropriate benefit rate as a maximum limit. The whole cost (including the cost of administration) is borned by the Exchequer as in the case of transitional benefit after April 1, 1929. Approximate particulars of receipts and payments for the financial year 1933–34 are as follows: Contributions, employers and employees, £39,670,000; Exchequer (equal thirds), £19,800,000; total receipts, £59,470,000. Insurance benefit, direct, £38,250,000; indirect, £2,040,000; administration, £3,800,000; interest, £5,270,000; miscellaneous (refunds, grants toward approved courses of instruction, etc.), £210,000; total payments, £49,570,000. Transitional payments and cost of administration (the total is repaid in full to the fund by the Exchequer, and is not included in the insurance account above) amounted to £52,250,000.

War pensions: The number of war pensions or allowances in payment as at March 31, 1933, was 1,107,000 approximately, and the estimated expenditure of the Ministry of Pensions for 1933–34 was £45,200,800, and the estimated expenditure for 1934–35 is £43,100,000 (inclusive of administration expenses).

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I am glad this Government has finally decided to consider seriously the great social-security questions now involved in this bill. The questions of old-age pensions and out-of-work insurance have been given more earnest consideration at this session of Congress than at all the sessions of Congress since the Constitution of the United States was adopted.

I realize that in the consideration of initial legislation or new legislation there are two very divergent views, especially so when you are considering legislation with reference to social security. There are those who are ultraconservative. Then there are others who are very extreme. Always between those two extremes, legislation takes the middle course and reaches fruition.

I realize there are a great many imperfections in this bill. I do not expect it to be perfect, but I do know there are a great many questions of national importance, embracing almost every phase of social legislation in this bill. In addition to old-age pensions and unemployment insurance we have a provision providing for dependent children, infant and maternal welfare, welfare service for children, vocational rehabilitation, care of crippled children, Federal Public Health Service. All of those are very vital questions which are embodied in this legislation.

Now, with reference to unemployment insurance: The wage earners, those who could act in unison, have been carrying on an incessant struggle for the enactment of unemployment-insurance legislation. For 10 or 12 years the American Federation of Labor exerted its efforts for the enactment of a Federal employees' retirement act. That law provides, as you know, for 3 percent of the earnings of the Federal employees to be checked off and become a part of the fund. The railroad employees have been attempting to build up some sort of a retirement fund. We enacted in the last session the railroad-retirement law and, as you all know, that is now before the Supreme Court. The State of Missouri, my State, has just enacted an old-age-pension law. The house and senate have passed the law but the Governor has not yet signed it. That provides a maximum of $30 a month. If this bill is enacted, that will make it possible for some old folks to secure a maximum of $45 a month. In any case they will receive at least $25 a month, although they draw the minimum as provided in the Missouri law. Now, if this bill is passed it will not directly affect men between the ages of 45 and 65, but by the enactment of the Railroad Men's Retirement Act, if it should go into effect, it is estimated that in the first year it will take out of service approximately 250,000 railroad men, placing them on a pension or annuity. That would naturally make openings for 250,000 younger men. In the railway-train service there are very few men now working for a railroad who have less than 30 years' seniority. Many of them are over 45 years of age; so that 250,000 young men will be placed in the service. I say that will have the effect of creating employment.

What I am interested in especially is the establishment of the principle. To my mind, this is the most far-reaching piece of legislation and is the most constructive and most humane proposal that this Congress has considered, or any other Congress has considered, for many years past. It is establishing that great principle of caring for our old folks, for the aged and the needy, caring for the children, crippled children, caring for the unfortunate mothers in maternity welfare. There are so many angles to this bill, and it reaches down into so many phases of social security that I think it is the most humane and constructive piece of legislation that we have ever considered.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. I yield.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is president of the State federation in the State of Missouri, is he not?

Mr. WOOD. Yes. It was not necessary to mention that, however.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. But I wanted to make a point.

Mr. WOOD. The gentleman has asked me that two or three times. I tell the gentleman again that I am. Every time I have spoken the gentleman asked me that. I hope he finds out some day that I am.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. You are then affiliated with the American Federation of Labor?

Mr. WOOD. Oh, yes. I have told the gentleman that, too.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. All right. Now, this is the point I want to make.

Mr. WOOD. Now the gentleman is taking up my time.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. No. This is on the question of labor. I was informed when this bill was first introduced that the American Federation of Labor was against it. Now I have been informed they are for it.

Mr. WOOD. I do not know who the gentleman's informers were, but they misinformed the gentleman.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Has the American Federation of Labor endorsed this bill in its present form?

Mr. WOOD. I do not know whether they have in its present form. They endorsed the original bill. They endorse the principle.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Then they are not opposed to this bill?

Mr. WOOD. Even if the American Federation of Labor or the Manufacturers Association or any other association have or have not endorsed it, I am for this bill, because I believe it is right. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. FORD].

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that in an age of advanced civilization the United States has come thus far along the road of national development without establishing a plan and furnishing funds for taking care of the old people of our country.

England, Germany, France, Belgium, Australia, and Canada have excellent old-age-pension systems. The United States stands alone with China, of the major countries of the world, in its failure to provide for the aged people of the Nation. A total of 42 foreign countries now have old-age pensions and they have found it to be more economical than an almshouse system with all its congregation of misery. Denmark, a little country with only 5,000,000 people, pensions all its citizens over 50 years of age who have no means of support. With the economic advantage in mind it would appear that all would favor a well-established system of old-age pensions, even if they refuse to recognize the existing moral obligation.

I want to tell you that providing for those who have spent a lifetime of honest toil is not charity from the Government. I resent that sort of an interpretation being placed by some on this matter. It is a duty of humane civilized government to care for those citizens who have spent a lifetime in promoting their country by being good citizens. I can easily see where the path of duty lies on the matter of old-age-pension legislation and I regret that there is any opposition to the passage of a bill that will guarantee our aged citizens relief from the mental and physical torture of poverty in old age.

There is no justification whatsoever for a great, powerful, wealthy country like America leaving its aged people to shift for themselves while suffering the impediments of old age. After a life spent in rearing a family, paying taxes, and assisting in generally maintaining the country they are left to gaze toward the sunset of life with the ghastly figure of economic uncertainty appearing on all sides. There are no steps taken to help them combat the strenuous battle of life. My friends, everyone knows that the majority of our old people are not responsible for being unemployed or without funds. The inescapable disabilities of age prevent work. A bank failure, a bad investment, or a false friend may have swept away the savings of a lifetime. All their lives have been spent in a battle against a stubborn, adverse economical system.

Mr. Chairman, with this in mind I cannot agree that the several States should be required to match dollar for dollar with any funds furnished by the Federal Government for payment of old-age-pension benefits. Many States are absolutely unable to furnish any funds at all for this purpose, thus preventing any aged, needy citizens from receiving help in those States while citizens of other States are being granted assistance. It is my contention that the Federal Government should set a definite sum per person to be granted each State for all persons in that State above a certain age. If the State is able to furnish additional funds it should be allowed to do so. If the Federal Government agrees to furnish a certain sum per month for every person over a certain age, then let it furnish that sum, without requiring that the State furnish an equal sum per person. I can name a number of States which will not be able to furnish any additional sums to match Federal assistance. I ask you if it is fair for the citizens of those States to be barred from the same relief that is going to other States because the other States happen to be richer. The richer States need it the least, and under the provisions of this bill they will receive it the most easily, while the States really in need will have no relief at all. I most earnestly ask you to amend this bill so as to see that all American citizens receive equal benefits, benefits to which you know they are entitled.

Mr. Chairman, I want to remind you of that clause in the Democratic platform of 1932 which said, "We advocate continuous responsibility of the Government for human welfare * * *."

I ask the Democratic Members, who are in such vast majority here, to discharge their obligations as Congressmen, as well as fulfill the obligations of the party. That means that we should all vote for an old-age-pension law that will bring some adequate relief to the aged citizens of our country, for they are entitled to a law that will bring relief without discrimination between the rich and poor States.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. WOOD. Would the gentleman consider the 28 States which have passed old-age-pension laws as the richer States?

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. I do not think I would consider all of the 28 States as the richer States of the Union; but I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that if he will check up on the legislation that has been passed by the 28 States which he refers to he will find a mere handful of people receiving pensions under the State law. I had hoped that we might enact a law that would provide a uniform system of benefits to the old citizens of our country who are unable to work or financially care for themselves. If, however, certain States cannot meet the requirements of the act now under consideration because of financial inability to do so, the aged people of those States, just as deserving as the aged in the rich States that can comply with the requirements, will not be able to share the benefits proposed by the legislation.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. HOUSTON. Does not the gentleman know that at the present time over 50 percent of the Federal taxes are collected from six States?

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. That may be true, but does not the gentleman also know that most of the wealth that is now in those particular six States came from the people in the poor States and that it is now in the hands of the very few in this country? If the poor States have produced the wealth and we are trying to reach a better social position in this country, we cannot help the old people of one part without helping the old people of another part. Why should not the rich States be willing to say, "Yes; we will help the aged people in the poor States and put them on the same basis as those who live in the richer States"?

Mr. HOUSTON. Is this a share-the-wealth campaign?

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. The gentleman might term it that if he desires. I am trying to reach all of the people of the country. If we help a selected few in some of our States and do not reach out and get those in the poor States, we might as well throw this piece of legislation into the wastebasket for the good it will do the people as a whole. We cannot help a few people in the country and fail to help those who cannot help themselves. If we are going to act as legislators in Congress, we have to think about the country as a whole. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS].

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I am going to devote my time to speaking on title IX of the social-security bill, which refers to unemployment compensation. The committee report in title IX states in part:

> The failure of the States to enact unemployment-insurance laws is due largely to the fact that to do so would handicap their industries in competition with the industries of other States. The States have been unwilling to place this extra financial burden upon their industries. A uniform, Nation-wide tax upon industry, thus removing this principal obstacle in the way of unemployment insurance, is necessary before the States can go ahead. Such a tax should make it possible for the States to enact this socially desirable legislation.
> This is one of the purposes of title IX of this bill. In this title a tax is imposed upon employees throughout the country against which a credit is allowed of up to 90 percent of the tax for contributions made by employees to unemployment compensation funds established pursuant to State law.
>
> That this tax is imposed on employees is indicative of the conviction that employers should bear at least a part of the cost of unemployment compensation, just as they bear the cost of workmen's compensation. Each State is, of course, free to assess not only employers but employees; and in this connection it may be noted that in European countries, and under the law recently passed by the State of Washington, employees are required to contribute.
> The amount of benefits payable for unemployment from contributions amounting to 3 percent of pay roll would vary from State to State. The maximum period for which benefits may be paid depends not only upon the rate of unemployment, but also upon the percentage of wages paid as benefits, the length of the required waiting period, the ratio of weeks of employment to weeks of benefits, and other provisions. The scale of benefits which States will be able to pay from a 3-percent rate of contributions on pay rolls will carry the great majority of unemployed workers through normal years until they are able to secure employment again. While the Federal tax is limited to 3 percent (1 percent in 1936 and 2 percent in 1937), some States will probably increase the benefits payable by requiring also contributions from the employees or the State government. Under a reasonable scale of benefits, reserves would accumulate in normal years to carry the fund through minor depressions or the first years of a major depression.

I want to bring to the attention of the House the enormous importance of keeping our industries running in order that wages may be paid. Again I wish to bring to the attention of the House the fact that ruin is certain if something is not done to save the great cotton-textile industry. The people of the country ought to realize also that no one on relief will receive a particle of benefit from this title. It is of great importance that the wheels of industry be kept turning and wages paid.

Tuesday President Roosevelt is reported to have said to the press that the processing tax is vital to the farmers. I speak not for the cotton farmers alone. I speak not for the mill owners alone. I speak for the 440,000 mill workers and for the 9,000,000 workers who earn their livelihood from raw cotton. I speak for the people of the entire United States—for every individual in every city, town, and hamlet in the United States is affected. It is vital to them that the burden of the processing tax be lifted. I took my demands to President Roosevelt this morning. He has not yet acted to save the cotton-textile industry, but I believe he will. The industry is in direst need; it cannot carry on without relief of some kind. I am vitally concerned with the interests of our people and will fight with every ounce of energy I possess to maintain and protect a basic industry which under normal conditions affords the opportunity for thousands of people to work and earn their living. I appeal to you to fight shoulder to should with me—to demand of those who have the power to use it. President Roosevelt has full authority to save the situation. He must do it. We have a right to demand that. It is only through work that a nation can survive. If the sources of employment are allowed to disintegrate and disappear the very existence of the Nation is threatened. For our American people to be forced into unemployment by difficulties which can be corrected or forced into other channels of work, if such could be found, for which they are not trained and cannot successfully perform, is not only gross but willful inefficiency, the responsibility for which should be definitely placed. A nation cannot afford to be inefficient, especially during a period of depression.

When your home and family are in danger you fight, even though the odds against you may be overpowering. With your back to the wall you grasp at every advantage and every aid. That is exactly how the cotton workers feel today. They are desperate. They are on the verge of hysteria with the tragedy of it all. They appeal to the Nation for the right to exist, the right to earn a normal living and enjoy the privileges to which every American is entitled. While their battle is an economic one, it is just as serious a war as any yet fought, and its effects quite as far-reaching.

During these days of tremendous economic readjustments we cannot assume a set of economic premises and rationally deduce conclusions helpful to the solution of our problem. We are living in a practical, rapidly changing world—not a world of assumed conditions. We must face the issues of our problems as they actually exist and try to reach a conclusion as judicial as possible for all concerned in view of those conditions. The textile industry is one of the oldest basic fundamental industries in America. The first cotton mill was established in Rhode Island in 1790. The industry has had and still has a tremendous influence on the development and industrial life of our Nation. There are thousands of our people who are dependent upon the industry. They need the industry. They are anxious to earn their incomes.

Two important factors contribute to the cause of this blight which has fallen upon one of America's greatest industries—the cotton-textile industry—one the processing tax and the other the destructive competition from Japan.

Many of my listeners are familiar with conditions in a mill town when work is plentiful. We of New England have known the happiness and contentment of steady work and wages. For the last few years, however, we have seen the cotton-textile industry steadily decline. We have seen factory after factory move away to establish elsewhere, to take advantage of wage differentials or economic conditions. We have protested and urged that the differentials be adjusted equitably. But that is not what is worrying us now. It is something bigger, more devastating; something that does not affect New England alone, but every part of the United States.

It is not difficult to visualize the vast number of people affected by the alarming conditions in this industry. Its ramifications reach into every home in the land. The cotton farmer of the South, the small-town merchant of the West, the exporter at the gateways of commerce, all are dependent upon the well-being of this tremendous business. If it falls, they fall.

Conditions in the industry are alarming. It is dying a slow death. In my section of the country there is no necessity for calling attention to it. It is only too evident. But you who are sitting before your radios in other parts of the land, to whom the textile industry means nothing until you notice perhaps that the price of your favorite brand of cotton sheeting or print goods has advanced to a noticeable degree—it is you I want to reach. As you know, the Government has placed a levy called a "processing tax" upon the manufacturers of cotton goods, the money so collected to be used in paying the cotton farmers for reducing their acreage and so limit their crops. From August 1933, when the tax was first levied, to December 1934, these taxes amounted to the tremendous sum of almost $200,000,000. The effect of this burden has been a substantial increase in the cost of cotton. In some instances this increase has resulted in sales resistance and the substitution of other fabrics by the buying public. How heavy a burden it is can be appreciated when I tell you that the levy amounts to approximately one-half of the amount the industry pays in wages. The ultimate payment of this money falls with the greatest burden upon the poorer people. In its operation the cost of the actual amount of the tax per yard is far heavier in the cost of heavy goods purchased by the workingman than in the finer semiluxury goods. You know how many of the working people must wear cotton clothing, must buy cotton sheeting and cotton pillowslips and towels. It is working a tremendous hardship upon them. It seems as if they must always pay the price. But these people cannot afford to pay more, with the result that the tax remains with the manufacturer.

To add to the troubles and worries caused by this processing tax comes another factor which must be faced and faced immediately. Japan, with its low-priced labor, home workshops and thousands of hand looms, has set out to capture the textile market of the world. Practically all of her larger cotton mills are equipped with automatic-weaving machinery far superior in speed to ours and operated by trained girls who think nothing of tending from 30 to 40 of these looms for as little as 20 to 25 cents a day. Japan can import American raw cotton, transform it into cloth, export it back to America, and sell it for less than the American manufacturer can make cloth. How can Japan do this? Because of thousands of these little Japanese girls, content with their 25 cents a day, living on rice, in surroundings no American laborer would tolerate, regimented into an army of workers to battle against our textile employees who rightfully enjoy the comforts and privileges of a decent existence. It is a battle of human bondage against normal existence, and thus far human bondage seems to be winning. Is it not absurd to allow us to be beaten by an army of little Japanese girls?

The result of this competition is obvious. Our exports of cotton-finished goods have dropped to almost nothing. Central and South America, which bought thousands of bales of cotton cloth each year, are now flooded with Japanese textiles landed at a price which approximates our cost of manufacture. If it stopped there we might survive. But the importations of Japanese textiles into the United States for the first 2 months of 1935 surpassed the importations for the entire year of 1934 by several millions of yards, and it is increasing month by month.

This loss of trade, this cessation of orders, has dramatically called the attention of the entire country to one of the basic reasons for our inability to compete. As the boa constrictor tightens its coils about its victim, squeezing and pressing until the lifeblood ceases to flow, so has the processing tax sapped and squeezed the operations of our cotton mills until one by one they are dying from lack of orders and from inability to function profitably.

Picture if you can a mill city, where block after block of mills line the streets, employing thousands of workers. I wish you could see the bustle, the life, and activity when one of these immense factories lets its workers out at the end of the day. A veritable army of men, women, and girls surges forth to scatter to their homes, to their diversions, or to trade in the stores. Happy, contented, tired, with the satisfaction that comes of a hard day's work well done.

Picture again that same city with its mills closed, its people idle, its looms still and silent. It is like a city of the dead. The thousands of windows of the mills look down upon streets devoid of activity; about the gates stand loiterers wistfully hopeful that news may be gleaned of the watchman of an early reopening. Even the children playing about the yards have caught the slowing tempo of dejection and despair. It sounds funereal, but I assure you that it is more permanent, more devastating. You see it in the faces of all the people, in their mannerisms, and their activities. Nothing disrupts family ties so much as uncertainty of income. The life of the community is changed entirely. Hardly a business but that is affected materially. Do we want our cities to become cities of the dead? That is what is happening today. But they can be saved.

In this country we have in the neighborhood of 440,000 textile workers. Their yearly wages approximate $300,000,000. These figures were given me by a Government department and are conservative rather than excessive. I quote them simply to show you the magnitude of the business which is facing certain ruin under present conditions. The textile industry as a whole, and of which the cotton-textile group is an important part, is America's largest and most important business, employing a million and a half people.

Our export market for raw cotton, as you know, has gone the way of the finished goods. Japan was our last heavy customer, and now they are looking to fill their needs with Brazilian cotton, far cheaper than ours, but said to be equally good. The Soviet Government expects to export a million bales more cotton this year than last. Already the American price is so much higher that it is actually found profitable to bring back from Japan raw cotton stored there for sale. Of what avail will be the millions of dollars now going to the southern cotton planters if they have no market for their raw cotton at home or abroad? This Government at present has 6,000,000 bales in storage. Think of the effect upon the cotton pickers and their families. Distressing as conditions were when cotton dropped to 5 or 6 cents a pound, the present outlook appears worse. The workers of the South, depending upon the united labors of their families during cotton-picking time, in order to carry them on during the year, are the ones who will be affected most.

We all ask, "What is the remedy? What can we do to save this industry?" There are several methods of relief. The President of the United States has the power, given him by Congress, to place an embargo or quota upon the importation of these goods. He has the power to adjust the tariff. He also has the power to lift the burden of the processing tax and save the industry. Another avenue of escape from destruction and tragedy is contained in the amendment to the work-relief bill, introduced by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE]. This amendment authorized the President to use the money at his discretion. In other words, he has the power to take the burden of the processing tax from the manufacturers and provide the money to pay for acreage reduction from the vast sum just authorized.

The question in everyone's mind right now is: "Will the President do this?" Will he come to the rescue of a dying industry and redraft the tariff regulations so that foreign competition will not close our mills? He can limit Japanese imports to a percentage of the total consumption of cotton goods in the United States. Will he equalize the wage differentials in this country to bring about a more equitable manufacturing cost in the industry? Will he lift the burden of the processing tax from the industry?

The answer lies with him. The people of my home city of Lowell are writing to President Roosevelt, using their own words, describing local conditions, and urging him to avert this tragedy and give the matter immediate consideration before it is too late. He has all the authority necessary to save the industry. Congress gave it to him. Now is the time for him to use it. We have a right to demand it. There is hardly a person in this country but who is affected by the question. I hope you all will become actively interested. It is not a sectional matter. It does not affect New England alone, or the South alone. It is vital to every one of us—the farmer, the manufacturer, the worker, the merchant, the consumer. Many of you know the agony of losing your jobs. Is the agony not greater when you know it could have been prevented? Let the North, the South, the East and the West join together and win the fight. The textile industry can be saved. It must be saved.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Puerto Rico [Mr. IGLESIAS].

Mr. IGLESIAS. Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to enter into a discussion of the divers views in regard to this bill. I cannot ascertain at this time what the bill in its final form will be as passed.

I feel it my duty to call to your attention a matter of great importance to the people of Puerto Rico. My appeal at this time is in connection with the social-security legislation recommended which the House already has begun to consider.

I want to refer to one provision of this House bill No. 7260, which contains a definition of the United States, embracing Alaska, Hawaii, and the District of Columbia, but it does not include Puerto Rico. Chairman DOUGHTON'S original bill and similar bills introduced by Congressmen MEAD and LEWIS do include Puerto Rico in the definition of this Nation.

I feel, Mr. Chairman and Members, that it is not wise to exclude the people of the island from participating in the obligations, responsibilities, and benefits of so far-reaching a national measure of social and economic character not only from the standpoint of fairness but also to instill the principles of the Nation's progress, humanity, and social education.

I request, Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, and I trust, that your recognized sense of fairness and justice will lead your good spirit of justice to find the best way of recommending the incorporation of Puerto Rico in the definition of the United States into this humanitarian measure through a proper amendment.

Certainly Puerto Rico, an organized Territory, whose people are citizens of the United States, is an integral part of the United States, and in all fairness and justice the people of Puerto Rico should be permitted to participate in the obligations, duties, and benefits, as well as in the obligations and responsibilities, of so far-reaching a social program.

In this connection may I prevail to the extent of asking the chairman and members of the committee who are in charge of the stated bill now under consideration, and the Members of the House who will vote for the measure, requesting them to favor the inclusion of Puerto Rico in this legislation through amending it.

The plain facts of my request are that Puerto Rico has been American territory since 1898, and since 1917 all Puerto Ricans have been declared American citizens by action of Congress.

The following resolution was unanimously approved by the National Labor Convention of 1933:

> Whereas the American Federation of Labor was always ready at all times to give its worthy support to the cause of the people in general and labor in Puerto Rico and to help our island: Therefore, be it
> Resolved, That the president of the American Federation of Labor be authorized to earnestly urge and lend his moral support and help before the President and Congress of the United States to every measure and plans of rehabilitation as set forth in previous reports and recommendations of the executive council and the resolutions passed by the last three conventions, 1929, 1930, and 1931, of the American Federation of Labor.

Puerto Rico, gentlemen, stands today as the first best buyer of American goods in all Pan America, and the eighth of all European nations. The fact that Puerto Rico has bought and is continuing to buy millions upon millions of dollars' worth of goods from continental United States is vitally interesting, and it is vitally interesting to know that two-thirds of the wealth and riches produced in the island comes to the United States and remains in the United States. As a matter of record, Puerto Rico has already bought about two thousand million dollars' worth of goods in the last 34 years. Two-thirds of this money has gone to the various corporations and commercial businesses in the United States.

Gentlemen and friends, I request you to look into this great little Puerto Rico as an integral part of our Nation, that you may know more about it and cultivate more and more the best feeling, extending to the people of the island the benefits and obligations of every congressional Federal measure intended to relieve and treat the island as an integral part of the Union.

Puerto Rico is American economically and socially in its industry, trade, and its practices under the American flag.

Mr. Chairman, we have in the island pension laws which provide for the employees of the insular government and for the police. Other general pension bills have been pending in the legislature for some time and which involve about the same principle as is advocated in this bill now under consideration.

For the last 34 years our men, women, and children have been educated under the American flag. The industries of America have gone over there and are leading the island in its progress forward and helping the great bulk of the people over there. We have obtained in the last 34 years the benefits of much of the progress that exists in America, but we want the measures of progress of the Nation to be extended to the island. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MCREYNOLDS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 7260, had come to no resolution thereon.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION RE TAX-EXEMPT SECURITIES

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, just about 20 years ago the question of tax-exempt securities became acute. The taxing of income derived from such securities was a matter of concern even earlier.

During debate on the proposal which subsequently became the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution, proponents of the resolution were called upon to state if it was their intention to include tax-exempt securities under the blanket provision of the new law, which read:

> The Congress shall have the power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration.

Replies to critics of the measure stated in no uncertain terms that there was no intention to affect the issuance of tax-exempt securities. These replies, used as a basis of the intent of Congress, have resulted in Supreme Court decisions regarding the sixteenth amendment which make it advisable to propose another amendment which shall be specific in its intent and beyond the realm of ambiguous interpretation.

House Joint Resolution 194, which I have introduced, is specific if not original. During every Congressional session throughout many years, numerous resolutions have been introduced in an effort to bring about and to control the ever-growing problem of tax-exempt Government securities.

At the present time about $40,000,000,000 are represented in Federal, State, and municipal securities which are exempt from taxation. The bulk of these are in the hands of very wealthy individuals who buy such bonds to avoid being classified in the higher brackets of incomes.

It is contended, and quite correctly, that Government bond issues would of necessity have to bear higher interest rates if subject to taxation and that the revenue to be derived by Government through taxes would not be as great as the loss through payment of higher interest rates. But there are other aspects to this situation which transcend such considerations and which cause the tax-exempt-securities question to be viewed as more important than ever before. The aspects might be enumerated in the following order of importance:

First. Profitable business expansion is retarded due to the fact that those most able to provide capital can better afford to be content with low-interest-bearing Government bonds. Forty billions of dollars are, in effect, being hoarded away from business expansion.

Second. Because of the ready market for their securities, Government, of all types, is and has been inclined toward extravagance.

Third. Exemption from taxation of public bonds in private hands undermines the theory of progressive income taxation.

Fourth. There has been created a tax-exempt aristocracy among the more wealthy; an aristocracy which can turn a deaf ear to the pleas of enterprise for capital.

Essentially, while Government, declaring the existence of an emergency and attempting to prime the pump of private enterprise, pours billions of borrowed dollars into the top of the pump, it is continually lowering the water in the well by permitting it to be drained from the bottom and placed away in cans labeled "tax exempts."

How can it be otherwise? We talk of the necessity for reviving confidence one moment and cry out about the necessity of borrowing billions the next. We say to the millionaire: "Stop holding back; put your dollars to work in productive enterprise" and in almost the same breath we say, "Here is a fine batch of Government bonds, tax exempt and as safe as the credit of your Government; put your idle dollars into these and you can then sit back, close your eyes, and cease to worry about what will happen to the fellows who are foolish enough to risk their money in other investments."

Mr. Speaker, no intelligent man can hold that the possession by anyone of one or several millions of dollars should be the cause of abusing the possessor. Any person who possesses wealth, whether earned or not, has a right to seek such investments as he may choose. The fact that he invests in tax-exempt securities is certainly no foundation for condemnation, but could often be said to be otherwise. The fault lies in the legislatures of the Federal and State Governments.

It has been said, and with good cause, that the question of taxing Government bonds could be settled by an act of Congress assertive of its present powers. That power exists under the Constitution. In fact, a simple resolution, declaring it to be the sense of Congress that the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution, when it says, "collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived", means just what it says, would form the basis for a new and proper interpretation by the supreme tribunal of the judicial branch of our Federal Government. Such a resolution could be based on the fundamental premise that public securities in the hands of private persons are private property and that the income from such securities is private income.

However, there would remain considerable doubt as to the status of such a resolution as affecting the several sovereign States. Ample legal argument has served to demonstrate the desirability of disposing of the matter by the adoption of an entirely new constitutional amendment.

In conclusion, I would like, if I may, to point to the fact that the adoption of House Joint Resolution 194 would be completely in harmony with the objective of the administration in bringing about a revision downward of interest rates. Despite the fact that there exist billions of unused reserve credit in banks, in industry and in commerce, the presence in the picture of this huge total of forty billions of invested principal, furnishing tax-exempt income, has the effect of sustaining higher interest rates in quarters harmful to national recovery. Recent announcements indicate that it is planned to furnish Government funds for many refunding operations deemed to be in the public interest. Would it not be better, more in keeping with our traditional Americanism, if we made it possible to carry out the refunding of these private debts with private capital? To be true, it would mean the payment by the Government of higher interest rates on its borrowings, but it appears quite clear that it would be more desirable to pay a higher interest rate on Government bonds and be forced to borrow less money for ineffective pump priming.

PATMAN BONUS BILL ENDORSED

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, when the bonus legislation was before this body recently I chose to continue my support of the Patman bill in preference to the Vinson measure. I went before the Ways and Means Committee, as I have done other times in the past, in support of the Patman bill over all other pending measures. At that time I was bombarded with telegrams from some of my closest and best personal and political friends in Oklahoma urging that I forsake the Patman plan for the payment of the bonus in full in cash by issuing Treasury notes against gold now in the Treasury of the United States. These friends urged that I favor the Vinson plan as sponsored by the national leaders of the American Legion, which proposed merely to authorize payment of the bonus.

I stated at the time that I supported the Patman plan because I felt that it was simply exchanging one Government obligation for another and would not create an additional debt. I could not bring myself to support the Vinson plan, which, I felt, would inevitably call for a bond issue requiring tax-exempt securities to be heaped upon the backs of the tax-burdened people of America. At that time very few of my friends wrote or wired urging that I support the Patman bill. Lately, however, I have begun to hear from the rank and file of the veterans. I find, somewhat to my surprise, that they are overwhelmingly in favor of the Patman bill. Not only am I hearing from the rank and file of the veterans, but many other citizens and organizations have commended my support of the Patman bill. I have not time, and do not care to take the space in the RECORD, to print a large number of these communications, but in the time allotted me I desire to read one such communication. It comes from the Veterans of Industry of America, and is under date of March 23, 1935. It is as follows:

Whereas the eight Members of Congress from Oklahoma have voted for the Patman soldiers' bonus bill, which not only gives our ex-service men the money due them, but provides for new money, giving the people a greater amount of money in circulation, and it further deprives the interest taker from collecting twice the amount from us in interest: Therefore be it

Resolved by over 500 leaders of the Veterans of Industry of America, assembled in Oklahoma City, Okla., this the 22d day of March, from over the State, and representing 170,000 members in this State, thousands of them ex-service men, That we commend our Congressmen for their vote in the interest of the ex-service men, the unemployed men, and in fact, in the interest of all except the money changers.

IRA M. FINLEY,
President Veterans of Industry of America.

Mr. Speaker, I would rather have that resolution of commendation from these 500 leaders of the veterans of industry of America in Oklahoma than to have the plaudits of all the international bankers and bloated bondholders in all the world.

My support of the Patman bill, of course, is distasteful to the big money changers with their swollen fortunes. I feel complimented to have such opposition. If the time ever comes that I should receive the support of these Wall Street manipulators and political parasites who wallow in the lap of luxury with money they do not earn, I would then no longer deserve or receive such wonderful commendation from such great patriotic organizations representing so many honest, straightforward citizens. I might add that this organization is carrying on a vigorous and courageous fight for the really forgotten men, women, and children of America, and against the special-privileged class that has too long plundered and plagued the American people.

I am glad to say that many other well-known organizations in Oklahoma have gone on record more than once as opposed to the efforts of big business to induce Congress to heap additional burdens on the people by continuing the issuance of tax-exempt bonds to fatten the coffers of the bloated bondholders. Among these great organizations that have endorsed the Patman bill in the past is the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America.

The Farmers Union has repeatedly gone on record as opposed to this bond racket, and it will be recalled that the late John Simpson time and again called the attention of the country to the serious dangers of floating tax-exempt bonds by this Government.

Today I received a letter from the present distinguished head of the Farmers Union in Oklahoma, Hon. Tom Cheek, complimenting me and other members of the Oklahoma delegation in Congress on our position on the bonus bill.

The Wall Street gang owned and controlled the last several administrations. High-powered lobbyists swarmed the corridors of the Capitol for the past decade, during which time we saw the sorry spectacle of much legislation passed by Congress by and for so-called "big business." Government had been turned over bag and baggage to the Mellons, the Millses, the Mitchells, and the Morgans. The so-called "Dawes plan" of financing private banks at Government expense came into vogue. The seat of government was transferred from Washington to Wall Street.

A long-suffering people finally revolted. The eyes of the Nation and of the world turned to that stalwart progressive who had proven himself a real friend to the common people. But no sooner had Franklin D. Roosevelt been swept into office as President than the same old crowd began to raise heaven and earth in a desperate effort to again ply their trade of pillage and plunder. They have opposed every progressive measure sponsored by the new deal and passed by this and the last Congress. These malefactors of great wealth are interested only in clipping their coupons. They are horrified at any suggestion of expansion or inflation of the currency. But their rule-or-ruin policy that destroyed and disgraced the last administration must not and shall not destroy this one. Now that the National Capital is again at Washington and this Government has again been returned to the people, it must not be destroyed by the money changers and Wall Street coupon clippers.

ATTORNEYS' FEES IN DETROIT BANKS

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a certain statement from the Treasury Department, which is in the form of a letter relating to the closed banks, bankruptcy cases, and payment of receivers' fees and things of that kind.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Are these the gentleman's own remarks?

Mr. DISNEY. No. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROWN] asked me to make this request, which is to extend my own remarks and to include this statement from the Treasury Department.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, was not this same material put into the Senate proceedings a few days ago?

Mr. DISNEY. I understand not, but I cannot give positive assurance to that effect.

Mr. MAPES. The Senator from South Carolina extended his remarks by putting in a letter from the Comptroller of the Currency. Does this relate to the so-called "McLeod resolution"?

Mr. DISNEY. I think not, but I cannot assure the gentleman. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROWN] asked me to make this request. He said he could not be here, and stated the matter was of public interest and it was important to have the record.

Mr. MAPES. Does it relate to the McLeod resolution?

Mr. DISNEY. I will show the gentleman what it is. I do not know.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I thought this might be the same data inserted in the RECORD over in the Senate. It is not and I therefore withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter written to my colleague, Mr. BROWN of Michigan, by the Comptroller of the Currency:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY,
Washington, April 12, 1935.

MY DEAR MR. BROWN: It gives me pleasure to comply with your request for information with reference to attorneys' fees paid in both of the Detroit banks. This office has completed a statement regarding the Guardian National Bank of Commerce, and a statement is being prepared for the fees in the First National Bank of Detroit.

You will be interested to know that the receivership of the Guardian National Bank of Commerce in Detroit is operating at a profit. As of December 31, 1934, the receiver had collected from interest, premiums, and rents, $2,874,479.45, which reflects a net profit from operations of approximately one and a half million dollars. The liabilities of the bank to depositors and other creditors as of suspension totaled approximately $114,000,000. The total amount collected from all sources up to December 31, 1934, was $67,825,438.88, and the total expense of liquidation, including expenses of the conservator, was $1,336,540.96. All amounts received from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation are eliminated from this computation. It thus appears that the total expense of liquidation as of December 31, 1934, was just above 1 percent of the liability to creditors and less than 2 percent of the total cash collected.

Some idea is obtained of the savings effected under the receivership when it is recalled that on December 7, 1932, the total number of officers and employees was 677, representing a pay roll of $1,212,171.16. On March 31, 1935, the number of employees had been reduced to 133 with an annual total pay roll of $255,241.44. The president and eight vice presidents of the bank received total salaries amounting to $142,000 annually. You will realize that these figures are only for comparison as it is not quite fair to compare the receiver's salaries in the liquidation of an institution with the salaries of a going concern.

Judge Frank E. Wood represents the Comptroller's office in the liquidation of the Guardian National Bank of Commerce, his associates being Hugh L. Nichols, Esq., Albert H. Morrill, Esq., and G. A. Ginter, Esq. Judge Wood employs in connection with the legal work of this trust Attorneys Zanone, Manley, Hugh C. Nichols, Schmidt, Runge, Kasfir, Kelley, Levi, Hogan, Harold Nichols, and Bachman, who also perform services for Judge Robert S. Marx, who represents the Comptroller's office in the liquidation of the First National Bank of Detroit. Of course, all payments to these attorneys are met from the fees paid Judge Wood and Marx. These two Detroit banks are the largest national banks ever liquidated by the Comptroller. Many novel legal questions were presented because of the Michigan bank holiday and the holding-company affiliations. It was obvious that litigation would ensue wherein the receivers would be opposed by the best legal talent available in Michigan. This situation made it imperative that the counsel selected to represent the receivers be exceptionally well qualified to protect the interests of creditors.

There were placed in Judge Wood's hands prior to December 31, 1933, complicated matters involving approximately $84,826,000 and, as of that date, in actual litigation he directly recovered for the benefit of the trusts or defeated claims asserted against it, sums totaling $5,590,943.87 itemized as follows:

All attorneys designated to represent insolvent national banks are required to agree that their fees for services rendered will be reasonable and subject to approval by the Comptroller of the Currency, whose decision as to reasonableness shall be final. Itemized bills are required describing in detail the services rendered, the time and amount involved, and the results obtained for the trust. Definite standards for the allowance of attorney fees have been built up in the Comptroller's office over a period of years, and each fee bill is carefully reviewed thereunder. The only bill submitted to the receiver by Judge Wood is for the period from February 11, 1933, to December 31, 1933, in the sum of $165,000. In this instance, 16,660 hours were spent by the attorneys on the matters referred to them. This bill was carefully reviewed by the legal staff of the Comptroller's office and by the same attorneys who have handled this work for a number of years, resulting in an allowance of $150,000. This allowance represents less than one-fifth of 1 percent of the amount involved in the matters placed in Judge Wood's hands. On this basis, for the period stated, each depositor or creditor with a claim of $100 was assessed approximately 13 cents for legal expenses, or thirteen-hundredths of 1 percent.

It has long been the policy of this office to avoid designating as attorney for a receivership an attorney, or a firm of attorneys, having a member who formerly represented the bank, who is a director or shareholder, or who is indebted, or one who would be embarrassed in any way in vigorously prosecuting the litigation bound to ensue. It was believed that practically all the leading attorneys or firms of attorneys practicing in Detroit might be embarrassed in representing these receivers, in view of the fact that practically all the large industrial and business interests of Detroit were directly or indirectly concerned in the liquidations, as debtors, shareholders, depositors, or otherwise. Accordingly, it was thought best to designate attorneys entirely disassociated with the banks or with these numerous interests. The developments since suspension would seem to justify this view, as all of the leading law firms or attorneys in Detroit represent interests in some manner affected by the bank's suspension. The National Bank of Kentucky, Louisville, Ky., was the largest national-bank failure prior to the failure of the Detroit banks. The firm of Nichols, Morrill, Wood, Marx & Ginter was designated as attorneys for this receivership on May 14, 1931, and their services to the receiver demonstrated their outstanding ability in bank-liquidation matters. As you know the designation of attorneys for the two Detroit banks was made prior to the time the present Comptroller assumed office.

In order to clear up the misunderstanding that national-bank receiverships are hedged with great secrecy, I desire to respectfully call your attention to the Comptroller's Annual Report, which contains full information under the following headings: All collections by receivers, collection and offsets allowed; collections from stock assessments; amounts borrowed from the R. F. C.; dividends paid by receivers to secured and unsecured creditors; distributions by conservators, payments to secured and preferred creditors; offsets allowed and settled; disbursements for protection of assets; receivers' salaries, legal, and other expenses; conservators' salaries, legal, and other expenses; a table showing the status, progress, and results of liquidation of all national banks placed in hands of receivers from the date of the first national-bank failure in 1865 to October 31, last, the end of the fiscal year in the Comptroller's office; separate tables giving dates of appointment of receivers; capital at date of organization and at date of failure; dividends paid while solvent; total deposits, bills payable, and rediscounts at date of failure; also tables showing assets at date of failure, additional assets acquired subsequent to failure; offsets allowed; disposition of all collections and dividends paid to creditors of all insolvent national banks, this information being given in detail as to each national bank.

In addition to this each receiver makes a quarterly report, showing:

Assets: Assets at date of suspension (book value as reported in receiver's first report); additional assets acquired since suspension (book value); stock assessment; total assets to be accounted for—cash collected from assets; cash collected from additional assets; cash collected from stock assessment; total cash collected from assets and stock assessment; offsets allowed on assets; losses charged off on assets and on stock assessment; remaining assets, consisting of uncollected assets, uncollected additional assets, and uncollected stock assessment; a recapitulation of remaining assets (book and estimated values), showing uncollected assets, uncollected additional assets, uncollected stock assessment, and a total of the remaining assets.

Liabilities: Secured liabilities at date of suspension; unsecured liabilities at date of suspension, additional liabilities established, total liabilities this date; secured and preferred liabilities paid in cash (paid by conservator); unsecured liabilities offset; unsecured liabilities for which receiver's certificates have been issued; unpaid secured liabilities (both proved and unproved); unsecured liabilities not paid or proved, total liabilities accounted for.

Collections and disbursements: Collections from all sources, showing cash collected from assets and stock assessment; cash collected from interest, premium, and rents; cash collected by receiver, and held as trustee for owners; Reconstruction Finance Corporation loans received (loan to conservator); total collections to be accounted for, disbursements of every character, showing secured and preferred liabilities paid (including dividends) (paid by conservator); collateral account (collections held by secured creditors and not yet applied); advances in protection of assets (taxes, insurance, etc.); expenses of receivership (expenses and advances by conservator); dividends paid to unsecured creditors (paid by conservator); Reconstruction Finance Corporation loans repaid; cash in hands of receiver and Comptroller; and total collections accounted for.

And this report is posted in the bank for the information of the depositors and creditors, and the general public.

May I compliment you on the keen interest you have displayed in the protection of the rights of the depositors of insolvent national banks and for the uniform courtesy you have shown this office on all occasions evidenced by this opportunity to refute the rumors to the effect that attorney fees of $250,000 or $300,000 had been paid incident to the liquidation of the Guardian National Bank of Commerce. I shall appreciate receiving your reaction to the facts set forth in this letter.

A similar letter is being sent to Congressman JESSE P. WOLCOTT, and I am releasing this letter to the press.

Yours very truly,

J. F. T. O'CONNOR,
Comptroller of the Currency.

Hon. PRENTISS M. BROWN,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including an address recently delivered by my colleague the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KLEBERG] before the Texas Ginners Association.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address recently delivered by my colleague the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KLEBERG] before the Texas Ginners' Association:

Mr. President, fellow citizens, and Texans, I address you as my friends in the truest sense of the word. The best definition of the word "friend" is one who entertains for another such sentiments of esteem and affection that he seeks his society and welfare. As your friend may I not thank you for this opportunity to greet you as such.

I have been privileged to serve the Fourteenth Congressional District in the Congress of the United States a little over 3 years. Though my office window opens on the inner courtyard of the new House Office Building, I hope my vision is not obstructed by the gray walls which surround it. The livestock ranges and the cotton fields of Texas, together with the view from my home window of the port of Corpus Christi, fill my mind's eye with constantly recurring visions of home. Since I began my service as a Representative of my constituency the more or less circumscribed definition of home in my conception has been changed considerably. The inner circle would now be defined by the outer boundaries of my district. The actual confines include those limits to which the interests of my fellow Texans reach. My home is in Corpus Christi—a gateway to the sea and the markets of the world. Corpus Christi is the county seat of Nueces County, one of the largest cotton-producing counties of the world. The Fourteenth Congressional District is bounded on the north by the progressive little city of New Braunfels. From New Braunfels you can travel south for nearly 200 miles and still be in my congressional district. Agriculture is, of course, the chief interest of my home-folks in this area, which is approximately 200 miles long and from 50 to 100 miles wide. We produce abundantly cattle, cotton, peanuts, watermelons, vegetables, all sorts of grain, some citrus fruit, and numerous other commodities which time does not permit me to list. Of these commodities more money is, of course, realized from the production of cotton and more people are thus engaged. The future of cotton is of more concern to more citizens than any other commodity. This statement holds true not only of my district but generally to all of Texas.

The cotton fields of Texas would furnish the beginning for an almost endless movie reel were a picture to be taken attempting to follow Texas cotton to its final end. A brilliant Oxford professor, James Rogers, in lecturing on the economic interpretation of history, voiced this idea—that "plants and fibers have interwoven with the development of civilization no less than fine-spun theories of government." For instance, the transformation of England beginning in the eighteenth century was to a major degree controlled and influenced by cotton and wool.

This "vegetable wool", referred to now as cotton, has played a part in the history of the world that cannot be ignored by thinking men and women. American history contains the modern pages only of the history of cotton. The gypsylike career of this essential product of the tilled field encircles the globe. Some historians refer to cotton as having been a primary crop among Chinese farmers 40 centuries ago.

Mr. President, a combination of conflicting emotions were first to be overcome in my approach to the preparation of this discourse. The pitiful inadequacy of human ability is best to be experienced by an adventure such as this. I therefore continue the approach to modern matters of interest with a deep and abiding solemnity of purpose. This can only be appreciated and experienced by one who has the task in hand. The human mind dedicated to the services of one's nation, one's state, and friends is forced to envisage the endless caravans which traverse the pages of history from an early date until now—pages replete with miseries and triumphs through which this fiber is woven from the beginning to the present time. The Encyclopedia Britannica describes cotton as "the most important of the vegetable fibers." Its various uses could not be categorically named within the limits of my time. Consumers are now using cotton for food, clothing, industry, and science. More than 2,000 uses for cotton are recorded in this country alone.

The first law of nature is self-defense. And national defense can properly be placed as the first law of nations. Were it realized how important cotton is in national defense every patriot in this land of ours, and particularly those in the Southland, would swear allegiance anew to our friendly monarch, King Cotton. We must depend on him. We must be his friend. And we must curb our selfish inclinations for our own sakes in order to avail ourselves of his ready and invaluable services.

During the period from 1929 to March of 1933 a greater shrinkage in demand for farm commodities, and in farm income was shown than in any other period recorded in the past 70 years. From August 1929 to August 1932 prices of all groups of all farm commodities at the farm declined nearly 60 percent. The farmers' gross income in 1931 was about $6,000,000,000, compared with nine billion five hundred million in 1930, and approximately twelve billion in 1929. This shows a decline of approximately 50 percent within the 2-year period. The farm income for 1934 was estimated to be over $8,000,000,000, representing an increase of approximately 28 percent over 1933. This indicates some of the strides we have made since 1932.

On March 4, 1933, by a majority of 6,000,000, a new President was elected and charged with the grave responsibility presented by our national problem. His attitude toward the farmers' problem is well known.

When President Roosevelt took office foreclosures had reached such appalling proportions as to become a national problem of the first magnitude. In Texas alone, where over 43 percent of all owner-operated farms were mortgaged for over $500,000,000, the estimated value of farms foreclosed in 1932 reached the alarming figure of about $60,000,000, or over one-tenth of the total outstanding mortgages. In my home county of Nueces over 43 notices were tacked up on our courthouse door within a period of less than 12 hours.

The Farm Credit Act was passed and the farmers' own credit agency, the F. C. A., has, since its birth and while still a baby, functioned more efficiently than any of the other agencies. Texas farmers know its worth.

With industry and labor both waiting on a recovery in farm commodity prices the Agricultural Adjustment Act was proposed and became a law. Its real purpose was to give the farmer his proper share in the division of the price of the commodity he produces.

Huge surpluses, wholesale foreclosures, and cruelly low farm commodity prices brought the A. A. A. into existence.

The cotton farmer in 1934 and 1935 found his farm refinanced, found his interest rates reduced, had new credit made available to him in the form of crop-production loans, production credit association loans, and cooperative loans. All of these were the consequence of the efforts of the President and the Congress through the A. A. A. program.

The cotton farmer received 12 cents for his cotton in 1934, as compared to 6 cents in 1932. Producers of cotton in Texas received over $100,000,000 in 1933 and 1934 in rental payments derived from the processing tax paid by the citizenry of every State in the Union. In effect, for the first time in history the North, West, and East combined in making contributions to the southern cotton farmer.

True, the temporary program which brought about the benefits enumerated cannot go on permanently. New plans and new processes must be evolved. Your representatives and the governmental agencies set up to serve you are daily giving study to the problems we must face.

When I left Dallas on Wednesday night, week before last, I flew over a dust storm (and just over it, by the way) at between 9,500 and 10,000 feet elevation. That dust came from somewhere and it meant a lot of loss and suffering to many. But it was only a small part of the gritty problem involved. Despite arguments to the contrary, our agriculture is still largely a tenant-farming proposition. The tenant farmer has had a bill introduced in his behalf by Senator BANKHEAD providing for his change into a real farm owner if he can meet certain requirements. This bill creates the Farm Tenant Homes Corporation. It provides credit facilities with Government supervision. The Corporation may purchase farms or make loans for this purpose. Title in the property may be taken by the tenant purchaser or the Corporation. Purchasers may be tenants or share-croppers of good character who know how to farm and are familiar with farm operations. If this bill is passed, every worthy farmer can contract and own the farm and home he has so long desired. The more agitated this good class of our citizens become the greater risk held in store for us and for posterity. At best, the tenant farmer is still on the farm an average of 4 years. It is not his farm, the usual contract he has does not reimburse or pay him for improvements, and on the average he can see no reason for taking care of the premises meticulously, and much less of the fertility of the soil. The average depth to which the productive soil on the average American farm reaches is from 4 to 5 inches. It does not take long without care to completely ruin the average farm. Time does not permit my dwelling on the Bankhead bill for tenant farmers, but suffice it to say that it is vastly important and should be supported. When our farmers play out, Texas ginners and Congressmen will, too.

During the past several weeks, in a dusty room in the old State Department Building, across the street from the White House in Washington, experts of your Government have been carrying on negotiations with representatives of foreign governments in an attempt to effect reciprocal tariff trade agreements. Several of these agreements have been adopted.

It is not an easy matter to adjust overnight the currency situation existing all over the world and make it possible for other countries to continue to purchase our goods under present conditions. A way must be found, and will be found, which will permit a more effective, economical, and profitable marketing of our products abroad.

We have heard a lot of talk about having lost our export market. I am not one of those who fail to realize the seriousness of such a loss. We are told that the increased production of cotton in other countries will, if not stopped, result in sending the American cotton farmer into oblivion. It might be of interest to make some reference here to the world cotton prospects. Exports of American cotton for the first half of the 1934–35 season were 42 percent less than the year earlier. The largest decline occurred in our exports to Germany, which show a decline of 80 percent. Exports to China were 68 percent less; to France, 58 percent less; and to the United Kingdom, about 45 percent less.

As I have stated, our cotton exports for the first 6 months of the 1934–35 season were 43 percent below the 10-year average. Our records show that the exports of lard have fallen 50 percent. The volume of exports of industrial products amounted to 66 percent of the 10-year average, while the volume of all agricultural products was 52 percent. The movements of practically all of our agricultural exports have been reduced even more than cotton. Some of the falling off in exports of cotton can be explained by the foreign mills' policy of eating into their stocks of American cotton already on hand. The fact that they are engaging in such a policy is confirmed by available figures showing stocks of American cotton in European ports. It is wrong to assume that these foreign mills can or will shift from American to foreign cotton in anything like the degree which American exports have declined. Instead, it is most likely that after the stocks are used up they will start buying from us in larger quantities than ever before. We must realize that the decline in exports has not been confined to cotton.

In 1934–35 world cotton production is estimated at 22,600,000 bales, as compared with an estimated production of 26,100,000 bales in 1933–34, and a 10-year average of 25,530,000 bales. Production in foreign countries for the current season is estimated at 184,000 bales less than the record for last season, thus indicating that foreign countries, too, will produce less cotton this year than last year.

Our export problems need attention, but I cannot agree with those who say that the falling off of our exports of all agricultural products is the consequence of the Bankhead law. More am I inclined to the view that the decline in exports is the result of reorganizations in foreign governments, money exchanges, and tariff barriers.

Your business should qualify you for the suggestion that I am about to make. Since the first gin was invented the purpose of this marvelous invention has remained the same through all the years, that of ginning cotton, which means the separation of the chaff and trash from the two marketable products—cottonseed and lint cotton. I am going to suggest here and now that, in addition to ginning cotton during the season, you undertake to gin useful ideas for a while in the interim. My job for the past 3 years has called upon me to do considerable studying and thinking, and this for the benefit of others. In your job, heretofore, as in the case of all of those engaged in private enterprise, your thinking has, for the most part, been concerned with your individual problems.

You are entitled to know, and through you the Texas cotton farmer is entitled to know, at least the general picture which confronts our country and our farmers. In my earnest opinion the most visible blot on the world picture is spelled T-A-R-I-F-F in capital letters. Since the World War thinking people in our land have struggled against terrible but by no means hopeless odds. A united purpose and a wealth of unselfish and intelligent understanding are essential before healthy world conditions can be expected. When the heat has been turned on too long, and we are not given time in which to cool off, the human reaction results in a wealth of cussing and cussedness. We have had too much appeal to our emotions and prejudices rather than to our common sense and reason. The fix we are in, and the part we ourselves have played in getting in this shape, is too long a story.

Despite the fact that we had become the major creditor country of the world, we completely disregarded our heavy dependence upon export trade and raised our tariffs higher and higher. Our refusal to accept imports, at least in reason, was exemplified by slamming the door in the face of other nations. We lent more and more money and in every case have refused to accept payments in the only form we could have reasonably expected them, namely, in goods. The value of foreign world commerce amounted to approximately $69,000,000,000 in 1929. In 1933 this had shrunk to $24,000,000,000. Our own foreign trade is a still gloomier picture. In 1929 it was approximately $10,000,000,000 and in 1934 a little below $4,000,000,000. We have not only suffered around $30,000,000,000 loss in trade since 1929 but we are getting less and less.

The farmer has by no means been the sole or the greatest sufferer in this phase. All of the employees of the transportation and communication businesses have suffered, particularly those who lost their jobs because of the curtailment of their business. Those gainfully employed in the production of coal and oil, which motivates the railroads and shipping and trucks, as well as those who manufactured merchandise and those who sold this merchandise to these workers, have all suffered greatly.

Let us turn another dark page, where we find listed the producers of those things we export. Over 7,000,000 workers, including the farmers, were in this group in 1929. This group represents the producers adversely affected by this trade decline. A large part of what they produced was domestically consumed, but it is estimated that no less than two and one-half million people were engaged in producing goods for export. Including the families of these people, at least 10,000,000 of our population were directly dependent upon export trade.

Now let us narrow it down to another line of employment. Look strictly at cotton, our major agricultural export, and let us see what the general prosperity of the cotton industry means. In the production of cotton alone we find that the manufacturing industries using cotton gave employment to approximately 3,000,000 people. This means that 4 out of every 10 employees in the manufacturing industry were employed in industries using cotton.

Statistics are tiresome, but they show conclusively that others beside the ginner have been on the rocks. While the export business of our country has shown a tragic and frightful decline, it is by no means lost. But we have a real job to regain it. This cannot be accomplished overnight. A return to general sanity and a definite determination not to go off half-cocked are prerequisites to even a beginning of the solution of this question.

We have rapidly and alarmingly, but I hope only temporarily, lost out in export trade; and as to cotton, in which we are most interested, we have lost, along with others, some products to a greater and some to a lesser degree. In 1931 and 1932 the world price on cotton was around 6½ cents; in 1933, from 9⅛ cents to 9½ cents, approximately. In those 3 years the world carryover of American cotton was a little over 3,000,000 bales in excess of world needs or consumption. At present the exportable surplus is selling at world prices and under the Government's program, despite a reduction to 43 percent of the world total in cotton exports, the rise in the price of American cotton has been responsible for bringing in $20 or more per bale on cotton exports above what we could have received without this program. In 1933 and 1934 a total of something over $215,000,000, represented by the above increase, was brought in.

It should be pointed out that while there is no question but that the economics of scarcity cannot endure as a permanent policy, yet once industry, labor, and agriculture get together the rules of the game will be changed so that a real and continuing profit will be the reward for abundant quality production rather than low prices at home and abroad. This is no time to abandon a domestic control of our production of important commodities. Governmental powers have for years been enlisted for the relief of industry and capital, and unless we retain for our farmers our partnership with Uncle Sam, for at least a time, a grevious error will have been committed.

During this Congress, of something over 170 bills involving foreign trade introduced up until March 1, there were only four or five indirectly designed to increase imports. Fifty-six of them placed even greater restrictions against them. It is safe to assume the age-worn principle of "turn about is fair play" will continue to operate. Unless we buy from others we cannot expect to sell to them. Try your gins on this one for a change.

Our farmers cannot expect full and complete prosperity until our country generally rests upon a foundation sound enough to support a real prosperity. Normality cannot be attained by artificial stimulation. It is by employment and wages that the citizenship of the United States can buy the farmers' products. But this is not all in the way of purchasing power required to finance both employment and wages. World trade has heretofore been largely responsible for the maintenance of these two important generators of a healthy circulation. Agitation and destructive criticism by opponents of the Government's efforts will only serve to retard the recovery in this condition from national convalescence.

I came to Dallas to talk to you, my friends, the ginners. Your job, as the farmers' hired hand, has been unusually simple up to now. I feel that in talking plainly to you I can probably better serve my fellow Texans in the cotton fields than through any other group. I realize that the ginners have undergone terrible hardships during the past 2 years. They have made great sacrifices by having their volume of business cut in half and by being charged with a part of the administration expense of the Bankhead Act. You cannot meet the added expense incident to the administration of the Bankhead Act out of the revenue you receive. We know that when you ginned over 4,000,000 bales of cotton during 1933 and only 2,000,000 in 1934 that you were hurt. Something is going to be done to partially remunerate you for your sacrifices. You should know—and I am confident you do know—that the prosperity of the ginning industry of Texas cannot be built upon 6-cent cotton, regardless of the number of bales we might produce in any other year. It has been your lot to bear some of the burden. In doing this you have the satisfaction of knowing that you have made a contribution to the farmers you have served, that you have aided in putting a stop to farm evictions, that you have played a part in reducing farm indebtedness, and that you have made it easier for the mortgage-ridden farmer to meet his interest charges and the payments on his home.

The Texas ginner should appreciate certain fundamental and long-established truths. One has to do with the old Texas story of the greyhound that quit for a minute while chasing a rabbit. He didn't catch the rabbit. This is no time for even the quitter to quit, much less for an intelligent and determined citizenship to quit for a minute. This is the wrong minute. It has been truthfully said that men who try to do something and fail are infinitely better than those who try to do nothing and make a complete success of it. The information at hand with reference to the Southland's greatest product is multitudinous but still woefully deficient. After many conferences with department heads and administrators it was discovered that the ginner was the only one who could add vitally useful information to this fund of knowledge. It was tentatively agreed that a bill should be introduced paying, for example, 25 cents a bale to ginners and thus permitting them to defray expenses to a certain extent by this fee for the performance of a governmental function. My best efforts have been expended in trying to find some way whereby your losses of last year could, to say the least, be partially reimbursed. The peculiar situation of serving three masters has made it impossible up to now to bring you good news on this. The ginner, you see, serves the Treasury Department in the Internal Revenue branch, the Agricultural Department in the A. A. A., and the Texas cotton farmer in Texas. The law relates to services involving the collection of a tax wholly within the domain of the United States Treasury Department and over which the Department of Agriculture, as they contend, has no control.

Last year when the loans to industries bill was pending in the House, I attempted to get some assurance that the Federal Government would come to the relief of the debt-laden ginners. You should tell your Congressmen and your farmers of your problem, and attempt to concentrate on securing legislation that will permit the refinancing of your indebtedness, the same as has been done for the farmer. Every effort will be made to make your services under the Bankhead Act lighter and your remuneration heavier. I hope the ginners of Texas will devote some thought to a program calling for relief in the form of governmental refinancing of their own obligations, reasonable reimbursement for the services they rendered under the Bankhead Act, and a more intelligent and efficient organization. You are the leaders in your respective sections. If properly used, your efforts can bring real results to yourselves as well as to the citizenries you serve. Misapplied effort and misdirected criticism will get you nowhere. Don't let yourselves be misled by those who care nothing for the producer of the commodity you process. His interest should be uppermost in your mind, and continued prosperity for him will be your safest guaranty of a modicum of relief.

PUBLIC RESPONSIBILITY FOR CRIME CONTROL

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, recently I delivered an address entitled "Public Responsibility for Crime Control—The Individual Responsibility for Crime Control."

I ask the privilege of extending my remarks in the RECORD by including this address.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I delivered before National Committee on Prisons and Prison Labor, January 8, 1935:

THE INDIVIDUAL RESPONSIBILITY FOR CRIME CONTROL

The time has come when we must realize that neither "they" nor "it" is the Government, but that the Government is you and I. We have no king; there is no hereditary nobility to govern us; there is nobody to govern this country except you and me, only the people. Nobody has any power except us, therefore nobody has any responsibility except you and me for the control of crime or for any other governmental matter.

We are in the difficulties we are in now because we have lost sight of that fact. We turned the Government over to professional politicians. We surrendered economic control to supposed-to-be captains of industry. We have failed to give to our Government its only possible safe guide, an advised, intelligent public opinion. Some of us are foolish enough to believe that the President and a few persons who happen to be Members of Congress are going to be able to solve our problems, will get all the benefit, all the development which comes from the struggle with our present economic and governmental difficulties. Our difficulties have come to give us a great people, not a few great leaders; besides only a great people make great leaders possible.

Under a normal appreciation of the facts of our circumstances and with corresponding consciousness of the responsibility which flows from these facts, my subject would be a perfectly silly one.

If I were asked when we are going to win through our difficulties, I could answer with all assurance, just as soon as we are made fit to win, and not until then. Only a great people can win this time. When the World War ended we were tired of fighting; we were tired of struggling, and apparently we were tired of thinking; we were tired of responsibility; we were tired of governing. We were tired of being grown men and women, and we seemed to have got the notion that we were not only the wisest generation that had ever lived, but that we were wiser than all the generations which had ever lived. The lessons, the warnings, the guidance, the wisdom, the inspiration, the results of actual experience which had been garnered from the ages came to be old-fashioned and out-of-date. Even the masterpieces of music which had thrilled and charmed and elevated the souls of the generations that had gone before were thrown into the discard. We ushered in the grand and glorious age of jazz. Not only of music but of literature, of philosophy, and of what passed for thinking with education, religion, statesmanship, and private living not free from its influence. To a large degree those who in any time of sound thinking and of a normal sense of responsibility would have attracted only that attention which a silly fool attracts were accepted as our leaders. Actually we had all tried to get young, and, in effect, succeeded only in getting silly. The world has never witnessed such a tragic comedy as that procession of the people following this new leadership, who were parading as their own creations discarded theories which they had dug from the junk heap of the world's failures.

Fundamentally that is why we are where we are. That is why we have this supergovernment of crime and the terrible governmental mess in which we are involved. We have been going places and going fast, everybody with a horn, blowing and whooping it up. We are at the end of the road. We have jazzed off into the jungles. We are still trying to find a boulevard to go out on. As certain as there are plans and laws which govern human conduct and fix human responsibility, we are going to have to strengthen our muscles and learn our lesson by cutting down the trees and going out over the stumps. There is no boulevard leading out from where we are.

We would not be warned by those who have sought to warn us, and we would not be instructed by the experience of others. Nature had no other alternative in such a situation than to let us go to the school of experience and pay for our instruction. History does not record so great a change in so short a time in the stamina and capacity of a people as has taken place among us during the last decade and a half. At the beginning of that time we occupied the highest point in courage, in patriotism, and in efficiency of every sort ever reached by any people. Now we lie soft; our strength, our self-reliance, our pride of independence, and our capacity all but lost because we have ceased to use it. Children learn to walk by walking. People learn to govern by governing.

Nature will not permit strength to remain where it is not used. Something had to happen; something has happened—that mystical, merciful agency which awakens the sleeping child and stirs him into action, which sends hunger to warn us it is time to eat, which sends oppression to drive to effort those who rather than struggle have submitted to tyranny—has come to our aid and come none too soon. In such a situation Nature has no delicacy in the choice of its instrumentalities. We had been warned. As generation after generation have traveled the road they had marked the way, they put up danger signals. Nature made that certain by fixing in human nature the instinct to write history. But we did not have time to read the signs. We were going places and going fast. We have arrived; we are at the end of the road. We would have lain down at the end of the road and died, but it is not written in the book of destiny that we be permitted to do it. We are being driven by the lash to the discharge of rejected duty.

Civilizations are not accidents; governments are not accidents. There are natural laws for their development, guidance, and direction. Rewards and punishments are provided. One of the punishments which has been provided for us, one of the instrumentalities which has been provided to bestir us from a fatal sleep is the intolerable condition created by the supergovernment of crime. The development of this supergovernment has not been accidental either. It is not a cause. It is a result. It provides necessity for action on the part of the people and thereby provides the opportunity for regaining a part of our lost strength—our lost governmental capacity. We had better get on the job.

There is no other public service which gives to the individual citizen a development and fitness for civic service comparable to that which is given to the individual citizen, who, responding to the call of duty meets the challenge of crime in his own community; courage, patriotism, self-reliance, all the virtues and elements of governmental capacity are put to exercise and thereby made to grow. This challenge of crime is not our misfortune. It is our opportunity. From a successful struggle of the people with organized and commercialized crime of today they may hope to become strong enough to go forward to a successful struggle with their far greater economic and governmental difficulties. Only a people who have regained their governmental capacity, regained their love for their country as distinguished from what they hope to get from its Treasury, regained their self-respect, regained their ability to think, can win through the barrier of difficulties which confront us today. We have no time to lose.

As individuals we have had our thinking machines in cold storage since the war. Others are supposed to have been doing our thinking for us—captains of industry who have been building up in this country an economic feudalism; politicians doing our political thinking—many of them copartners with crime. We are beginning to think. It is a dangerous time when people begin to think, but it is a hopeful sign. When we consider what our attitude is now toward these overlords of crime and toward public officials who are copartners with them, and recall that just a short while ago we laughed and joked about these things, we find we are making some progress. It was just a short time ago when leading newspapers of the country gave respectful notice to the meetings and divisions of territory and the doings of these criminals. Known copartnerships of public officials with them did not create disqualification for office in many communities. We are moving in the right direction; we are beginning to think—in the kindergarten grade, it is true. We are still thinking largely as little children think on Christmas Eve. A good many grown people are expecting Uncle Sammy Santa Claus to come down the chimney, free them from the domination of crime, bring a solution for our governmental problems, and fill their stockings and keep them full.

Many people still cling to the notion that there is in this country a creature called the "Government", which lives and moves and has its being as a sort of detached, self-determining, self-operated, and self-sustaining thing which does our thinking for us and does our governing for us, and acts as a sort of universal Santa Claus from which our States and cities and ourselves get things for nothing. Not little children but grown people have such a notion. With such a childish conception, nothing can be done yet toward the solution of our governmental and economic problems. These difficulties have come not to challenge a President and a few other public officials but to bestir and redeem the people of this Nation. Nothing short of an awakened, regenerated, invigorated, self-reliant people possessed of governmental capacity will be able to win through.

When we think a little further we will discover that every penny which comes from the Government must come from us first, with two pennies perhaps coming from us before we can get back one from the Government, because the great army of people who receive, administer, and distribute must be paid from that which comes from us before we can get any of it back. And when we think a little further we will discover that when we put away our own thinking machines, when we refuse the responsibility of governing ourselves, when we deny to Government its only possible safe guide—an advised public opinion—when we turn over to others responsibilities which nature has provided for our development, we must pay such a price as we are paying now. If we refuse to accept the responsibility incident to freedom, we cannot escape the yoke of the slave.

No people ever remained free who lost the ability to defend their liberty, and no people ever retained the power of self-government who were not willing to do those things which came within their capacity as individuals and as members of communities. It is a serious matter, of course, for the Government of a people to become financially bankrupt, but the bankruptcy of capacity to govern a people once capable of self-government, who surrender to the temptation of ease and indifference, is the supreme tragedy which marks the end of free government. We have already passed the margin of safety. There is no profit in getting nervous about our situation, and certainly no profit in deceiving ourselves about it either.

What is happening in Washington is relatively unimportant. The thing of importance is what is happening to the thinking and governmental capacity of the people. We could repeal our laws, nullify the Constitution, and tear down the Capitol, but if the capacity of the people to govern lives they could rebuild; but if the capacity of the people to govern is lost, free government dies and the dictator and firing squad become the instrumentalities of arbitrary power. History leaves no grounds for argument.

The people are beginning to think. They are becoming restive under the restraints of the present emergency policy of government. That is a good sign. When the whole economic structure was about to tumble it was necessary to give to our governmental machinery a greater strength and quicker pick-up than is ordinarily required.

That was done as it had not infrequently been done in Anglo-Saxon governmental history by concentrating emergency power in the executive to meet an emergency, but nothing could be more absurd than the notion that such an arrangement would be tolerated by Anglo-Saxon people as a permanent policy of government. Whether we shall have a grand smash or normal recovery will be determined by whether we regain our purpose and our power to operate a system of self-government in which a democracy of opportunity makes a democracy of government possible, before we shall have exhausted the ability of the Federal Government to provide artificial stimulants to keep things going. Nothing else can determine that.

Much of our basis for hope is in the fact that the people are beginning to meet this challenge of crime. This is the first major sign of the revival of civic decency and of governmental capacity. There are other hopeful signs. Any audience will listen now to serious discussions. That is a new thing. States are asking Congress for the right to form compacts to work out governmental problems of mutual concern. That is a good sign. After the formative period of a national government, among a self-governing people, all true progress must be in that direction which puts the power to govern and the necessity to govern closer and closer to the people.

Nature has no concern with the development of Government per se. Its concern is with the development of people. Its plan for their development is through the struggle. Difficulties constitute the gymnastic paraphernalia. Necessity compels exercise in that gymnasium. Nature does not consult; it commands. Our only choice is between reward and punishment. If we will not learn from the experience of others, we must be taught by our own experience. There is but one avenue of escape from such punishment and that leads in the direction of our opportunity to make this the greatest of all generations, because ours are the greatest difficulties perhaps of all times.

This movement of the people against crime is not limited in its importance by its effect upon crime. Its effect upon the capacity and the fitness of the people is of incomparably greater importance. This movement of the people against crime gives hope that we may be able successfully to meet not only this crime problem but with a citizenship fresh from the victory over organized crime, strengthened and developed and made fit by that contest, we may move on to a successful struggle with the greatest economic and governmental problems which up to this time have ever challenged the genius of any people.

COST OF ADEQUATE, GENUINE UNEMPLOYMENT, OLD-AGE AND SOCIAL SECURITY—SOURCES OF REVENUE FOR FINANCING THE LUNDEEN WORKERS' BILL, H. R. 2827

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein a statement from the Department of Labor as to the cost of social insurance as reported at a hearing of the Committee on Labor.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Speaker, many of our good friends, who are favorable in principle to the payment of average local wages or not less than $10 per week plus $3 for each dependent for unemployment, old-age, and social insurance, are asking: "What about the cost; and where can you get the money to pay for it?"

The hearings on H. R. 2827 recently held by the House Labor Subcommittee answer the question. They show that the Lundeen bill is not only an adequate but also a practical measure. By referring to the index of the hearings, Members of this House can find under the heading "Costs of H. R. 2827" the complete evidence presented in support of the statements I now wish to make.

SUMMARY OF ESTIMATED COST

To determine the cost of the social insurance which would be provided in H. R. 2827 requires several estimates, which should be used with caution. In the first place, the United States has no current basis for ascertaining accurately the number of unemployed.

The second and more important point requiring caution relates to the estimate of the effect of social insurance upon purchasing power, and its consequent results in decreasing the amount of unemployment through stimulation of reemployment. No experience in this country is available to indicate the extent to which an increase in consumers' purchasing power for those in the lower income groups would stimulate production and increase employment.

If it is assumed, however, that the entire amount of benefits paid under the provisions of this bill would appear in the market as new purchasing power, economists have calculated that 60 percent of this total would become available as wages and salaries. Therefore, on the basis of given average wages and salaries, it can be estimated how many persons could be reemployed, and this would result in a corresponding decrease in the number of unemployed eligible for benefits, and therefore in a reduction of costs.

Having in mind the above cautions, it may be said at once that if there be 10,000,000 unemployed, the annual gross cost, after taking care otherwise of those who should receive old-age pensions and those who are unemployed because of sickness or disability, and eliminating those under 18 years of age, to whom the bill does not apply, would be $8,235,000,000. Deducting from this the estimated decrease in the cost of unemployment insurance on account of the reemployment of workers following the establishment of a social-insurance program, $6,090,000,000, and adding to it the cost of old-age pensions, sickness, disability, accident, and maternity insurance, and deducting present annual expenditures for relief amounting to $3,875,000,000, we would have a net annual increase for the Federal Government imposed by the provisions of the bill amounting to $4,060,000,000.

If the number of unemployed be equal to the average number estimated as unemployed in 1934, as 14,021,000, then the annual net increase in cost, after deducting present expenditures for relief and estimating the reemployment which would follow adequate social insurance, would be $5,800,000,000.

The estimate of total costs of the program for social insurance under the bill should be compared with the amount that workers have lost in wages and salaries since the beginning of the depression. According to estimates published in the Survey of Current Business for January 1935, total income paid out to labor since 1929 was as follows (in millions):

	1929	1930	1931	1932	1933
Total income	$52,700	$48,400	$40,700	$31,500	$29,300
Loss from 1929		4,300	12,000	21,200	23,400

The total loss to workers in wages and salaries in the first 4 years of the depression has amounted to $60,900,000,000. It is with these huge losses sustained by American workers during these 4 years that the costs of security provided by the bill should be compared. Furthermore, considering the inadequacy of present relief measures, it must be realized that the cost of truly adequate relief would be the cost of this bill.

AUTHORITY FOR ESTIMATES

These estimates of the cost of an adequate unemployment, old-age, and social-security program are based on the statement of Dr. Joseph M. Gilman, economist of the College of the City of New York, who testified at the hearings held by the House Labor Subcommittee, representing the Interprofessional Association for Social Insurance. In accordance with permission granted me, I will now submit for the RECORD portions of Dr. Gilman's statement, taken from the hearings.

The first excerpt from Dr. Gilman's statement shows the estimated cost of the Lundeen bill on a basis of 10,000,000 unemployed, and may be found on page 585 of the hearings.

C. Number of unmarried persons 65 or over	2,486,000
Annual pension, $520 ($10 per week).
Cost of A	$2,700,000,000
Cost of B	542,000,000

Total	4,535,000,000

COST OF SICKNESS, ACCIDENT, AND DISABILITY INSURANCE

Class C, 1930 Unemployment Census (persons out of a job and unable to work on account of sickness or disability)	172,661

Class D, 1930 Unemployment Census (persons having jobs, but idle on account of sickness or disability)	273,588
Total	446,249

NOTE.—According to report of President's Committee on Economic Security, which states that 2.25 percent of all industrial workers are at all times incapacitated, it would seem that the total of 446,249 badly underestimates the amount of sickness and disability.

Class C type	250,000

NOTE.—$1,199 average annual wage, 1932, National Income Report, 1929–32.

PRESENT COST OF UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

It should be made clear that the cost of the Lundeen bill will not be over and above present expenditures for relief, but will replace these expenditures. At the present time, according to Dr. Gilman's statement, the costs of unemployment relief are as follows:

I. Federal Government (source of statistics: General Budget Summary, Treasury Department, estimated expenditures for year ending June 30, 1935, schedule 3):
(1) Federal Emergency Relief Administration	$1,733,208,700
(2) Civil Works Administration	13,842,100
(3) Emergency conservation	402,363,000
(4) Relief of unemployment	100,000,000
Public works:
(3) Loans and grants to municipalities	166,300,000
(5) Public highways	428,600,000
Total expenditures of a relief character	2,844,313,800
II. State and city (basis: Federal Emergency Relief Administration reports)	400,000,000
Total unemployment relief	3,250,000,000

PRESENT COST OF OLD-AGE RELIEF

Present expenditures by National, State, and local government bodies for old-age relief may also be deducted from the additional cost of the Lundeen bill. Present old-age expenditures are as follows:

1. Federal Government to veterans and widows (report of Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, 1933)	$235,000,000
2. State old-age assistance (President's Committee on Economic Security)	43,000,000
3. Industrial and trade-union pensions (President's Committee on Economic Security)	100,000,000
4. All other (rough estimate)	50,000,000
Total	428,000,000

PRESENT COST OF SICKNESS, DISABILITY, AND ACCIDENTS

The National Safety Council estimates for 1932 that wage loss from occupational disabilities was $370,000,000. Compensation for such loss is estimated as $200,000,000.

TOTAL PRESENT ANNUAL EXPENDITURES FOR RELIEF

Dr. Gilman's estimate of the total present cost of relief for unemployment, old age, and sickness at the present time is $3,875,000,000. This is based on the tables just presented.

REDUCTION IN COST OF WORKERS' BILL FOLLOWING PASSAGE

The estimates just given of the cost of the workers' bill represent the cost for the first year. The following tables show the estimated decreases in the cost following enactment of the measure, resulting from increased purchasing power.

The first table shows the total national income and the fraction of that income which is paid out in wages. Below that is the ratio of salaries and wages to income produced on a percentage basis.

Year	National income (excluding Government)[1]	Salaries and wages (excluding Government)[1]
1929	$76,500,000,000	$45,300,000,000

SOURCES OF FUNDS

Now I wish to answer the question often asked: "Where will you get the money for this program?"

It has been pointed out that an important difference between H. R. 2827, the Lundeen bill, and other proposals is in the source of funds. Other proposals—including the Doughton bill—depend on the building up of reserves in advance of payment of benefits, these reserves to be secured by a tax on pay rolls. Several serious objections are made to this method. In an article in the Annalist, published by the New York Times on February 22, 1935, by Elgin Groseclose, professor of economics, University of Oklahoma, under the title, "The Chimera of Unemployment Reserves Under the American Money System", attention is called to the provisions in H. R. 4120 in these words:

> The Wagner bill, as introduced in Congress, sets up in the Federal Treasury an "unemployment trust fund", in which is to be held all moneys received under the provisions of the act, and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to invest these moneys, except such amount as is now required to meet current withdrawals, in a defined category of obligations of the United States or obligations guaranteed as to both principal and interest by the United States.

The Annalist article summarizes the objections to these reserves for unemployment insurance as follows:

> (1) Financial reserves can be effective only in cases where contingencies can be calculated and determined by actuarial methods and where these contingencies arise in sufficient regularity to permit the arrangement of reserves in accordance therewith. (2) The incidence of depressions are irregular and unpredictable, and hence defy actuarial procedure. (3) Purchasing power cannot be stored up en masse under our money system, which is a system of debt, rather than metallic circulation. (4) The attempt to create unemployment reserve will intensify booms. (5) Unemployment reserves are incapable of mobilization when needed and any attempt to mobilize them will only result in further intensification of depressions.

Testimony before the Committee on Labor on the Lundeen bill (H. R. 2827) brought out the further objection that a tax on pay rolls is a tax on cost of production which is passed on to the consumer in higher prices to all consumers and to workers in lower wages as well as in higher prices to them as consumers. Thus it tends to reduce rather than to expand purchasing power, causing in itself recurrent industrial depression which arises out of the failure of consumption to keep pace with production, or a disproportion between money available for consumers' purchases and funds available for investment in increased production.

Moreover, these reserves, even if they could be accumulated without these disastrous effects upon consumers' purchasing power, and upon the monetary system, would be inadequate to cover more than a fraction of needs. The Commissioner of Labor Statistics and Senator ROBERT F. WAGNER (in radio addresses on Mar. 7) have estimated that if H. R. 4120 had been in effect from 1922 there would have been set aside by 1934 the sum of $10,000,000,000; yet, the figures on the national income published by the Department of Commerce show that in 4 of those years workers lost $60,000,000,000 of wages and salaries. Thus, even if reserves seem to involve saving the Treasury from obligation, as a matter of fact, they leave unsolved the real problem of protecting workers against the destitution of mass unemployment.

As the only adequate solution of the problem, and to avoid the unsound idea of setting aside reserves, the funds required in H. R. 2827 are made an obligation upon existing wealth and current higher incomes of individuals and corporations. These sources may be indicated as follows:

FIRST. INCOME TAXES OF INDIVIDUALS

If the United States were to apply merely the tax rates of Great Britain upon all individual incomes of $5,000 or over, a considerable sum would be available for social insurance. These rates in 1928 would have yielded the Federal Government five and three-fourths billion dollars as against slightly over one billion actually collected. In 1932, a year of low income, we would have collected on the same basis $1,128,000,000, as against the actual receipts of $324,000,000.

SECOND. CORPORATION INCOME TAX

Compared with other countries, also, our corporation tax is very low. Taking a flat rate of 25 percent, we would have raised in 1928 the amount of $2,600,000,000 instead of $1,200,000,000.

THIRD. INHERITANCE OR ESTATES

Here again the United States is very lenient. In 1928, on a total declared gross estate of three and one-half billion dollars, the total collected by Federal and State taxes was only $42,000,000, or a little over 1 percent. If an average of 25 percent were taken, this would have been raised in 1928 to $888,000,000.

FOURTH. TAX-EXEMPT SECURITIES

Exact figures on the total are not available, but here is an important source of large additional returns which should be available for the general welfare.

FIFTH. TAX ON CORPORATE SURPLUS

In 1928, the corporate surplus, representing the accumulation by corporations of funds which had not been distributed to labor and capital, amounted to $47,000,000,000, and even in 1932 it was over thirty-six billions. Made possible as it is by the cooperation of labor and capital, this surplus which is now set aside to meet capital's claims for exigencies certainly should be also a source of funds for labor's social insurance in the exigencies of unemployment. The Department of Commerce has showed in its study of the national income that labor has lost a larger percent of its earned income in the depression than capital has lost in interest charges, because capital has been sustained by drawing both on current income and on accumulated surplus. The great economist, Adam Smith, 150 years ago, called the industrial system a "collective undertaking." Thus it is both logical and just to provide a tax on corporate surpluses as a source for social insurance.

In support of my statements here, I wish again to offer portions of the statement submitted to the House Labor Subcommittee by Dr. Joseph M. Gilman. The first table estimates the funds available for unemployment, old-age, and social insurance. Please note that all figures in this table are in thousands. This table may be found on page 64 of the hearings.

NUMBER OF MILLIONAIRES DOUBLE

The sources of funds from income taxes in the higher brackets is greater today than it was a year ago. This is shown by the income-tax returns published by the Bureau of Internal Revenue. Dr. Gilman's tables, quoted below, show the number of income-tax returns made in the different income classes, and also the total amount of available revenue from that source.

ESTIMATES OF FUNDS AVAILABLE FROM INCOMES OVER $5,000

Applying the income-tax rates suggested in the table below, $4,622,814,000 additional revenue can be raised each year from individual incomes, and $1,431,273,000 from corporation incomes. The figures for 1928 are as follows:

These facts and figures, and the testimony of many other experts and economists and leaders of thought can be found in the hearings on the Lundeen bill (H. R. 2827). They show conclusively that the cost of the workers' bill is well within the ability of the United States Treasury to pay, and if we will raise our income- and inheritance-tax rates to the level of the British rate, we can raise the necessary funds. I hope that Members of this House will study these facts and figures and give their support to the Lundeen workers' unemployment, old-age, and social-insurance bill (H. R. 2827).

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SATURDAY, APRIL 13, 1935

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Merciful God, our Father, we thank Thee for the disclosure of divine love, which is the most transcendent power in the world. We pray that pride, vanity, and selfishness may be subservient to it, and may it inspire in us the true life and the best self. We would be men who search for hidden treasure and for spiritual knowledge, which are more to be desired than much fine gold. The revelation of our divine Teacher has taught us that because God lives, man shall live also; oh, wondrous words telling us that God is eternal and man is immortal; we praise Thee, most gracious Lord! As we pass this way, enable us to render sweetness for prejudice, prayers for hatred, gentleness and helpfulness to all. May we heed the great command, with which the whole creation is vocal, yet speechless and silent, "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might." Hold us to the good work of life until we can toil no more—then let us appear in Zion, before God. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed, with an amendment in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 6021. An act to provide additional home-mortgage relief, to amend the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, and the National Housing Act, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendment to the foregoing bill, requests a conference with the House thereon, and appoints Mr. BULKLEY, Mr. WAGNER, Mr. BARKLEY, Mr. MCADOO, Mr. TOWNSEND, and Mr. STEIWER to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

DISCRIMINATION AGAINST THE USE OF BARRELS AND KEGS IN THE DISTRIBUTION OF DISTILLED SPIRITS

Mr. TURNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein a house joint resolution passed by the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following joint resolution passed by the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee:

House Joint Resolution 26

Whereas the codes for the alcoholic beverage industries as well as Treasury Department regulations restrict the distribution and sale of distilled spirits to glass bottles; and

Whereas the wooden barrel and keg were the standard containers for distilled spirits for more than a hundred years before prohibition; and

Whereas the manufacture of staves, heading, barrels, and kegs is one of Tennessee's most important industries; and

Whereas the demand for wooden barrels and kegs has been drastically curtailed by restrictions which prevent their use as containers for the distribution and sale of distilled spirits; and

Whereas thousands of men in this State who would be employed in the woods, in hauling timber, in stave and heading mills, and in barrel plants have been thrown out of employment because of the lack of demand for barrels caused by these regulations; and

Whereas the farmers of our State who had planned to sell their oak timber to stave and heading mills to obtain funds to tide them over the drought and the depression have been unable to do so because of the lack of demand for barrels caused by these regulations; and

Whereas these regulations which restrict the distribution and sale of distilled spirits to glass bottles have unfairly discriminated against a prominent industry of Tennessee, with severe injury to the industry, to its employees, to farmers interested in the sale of their timber, and to the State as a whole: Therefore be it

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, That we hereby go on record as positively opposed to any regulations or laws which discriminate against the use of barrels and kegs in the distribution of distilled spirits; and be it further

Resolved, That the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee hereby go on record as favoring the immediate amendment of such codes and regulations as discriminate against the use of barrels and kegs in the distribution and sale of distilled spirits; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, to the Tennessee delegation in Congress, to the Secretary of the Treasury, and to the Director of the Federal Alcohol Control Administration.

I, Bert C. Dedman, chief clerk of the House of Representatives of the Sixty-ninth General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and exact copy of House Joint Resolution 26 adopted by said general assembly.

BERT C. DEDMAN,
Chief Clerk House of Representatives.

THE NYE-SWEENEY BILL

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein a speech I made in New York City on April 11 on the monetary question.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include a speech delivered by me at the Third Monetary Conference, under the auspices of the Sound Money League, held in New York City at the Barbizon-Plaza Hotel on April 11, 1935, as follows:

Mr. Toastmaster, ladies and gentlemen, permit me at the outset of this address to express my appreciation of the invitation to discuss with you this evening some features of the Nye-Sweeney bill, now pending before the Seventy-fourth Congress of the United States, which seeks to create a central bank to be known as the "Bank of the United States of America."

The invitation came to me from the former United States Senator, Robert Owen, chairman of the Sound Money League. I join with your distinguished toastmaster, Mr. Amos R. E. Pinchot, in paying tribute to Senator Owen, who in 1913, as a Member of the United States Senate, played a conspicuous part in the organization and development of our present Federal Reserve System. The Senator is one of the foremost authorities on our present monetary system. His endorsement of the Nye-Sweeney bill gives hope and encouragement to those of us who seek the destruction of the control of a few individuals over a privately owned banking system and its replacement by restoring to Congress its constitutional power to issue money and regulate the value thereof. We are certain the Senator will continue to display, as he has in the past, the energy and force which is so characteristic of his activity in the direction of sound monetary reform.

In discussing the monetary system of the United States of America, I do not do so in the capacity of an economist or a profound student of our present monetary system. I have approached this problem as an ordinary layman, believing as I do that the problem is one that affects the great mass of our people who are figuratively surrounded by a veil of mystery with respect to the so-called "money question."

There is nothing so sacrosanct or mysterious about our monetary system that forecloses the right of an ordinary layman to lift the veil and ascertain the reasons for its failure and its contribution to the present depression that we have experienced since the debacle of 1929.

I think I can say confidently that the eve of a new deal in our monetary situation is at hand. I have introduced in the House of Representatives the bill sponsored by the National Union for Social Justice and supported by the National Monetary Conference, Sound Money League, the Farmers National Union, and other organizations, to take the place of a banking system which has lost its primary function.

The facts prove this. The need of business men proves it. I have felt the pulse of my district in Ohio, as when the Thomas amendment was up a year ago. About that time the voice from Royal Oak, Mich., was on the air, urging that the listeners get in contact with their Senators and Congressmen in an effort to supply business with more money for its transactions. I received in one week 10,000 letters that came to me, urging me to support the Thomas amendment. They came in, not from bankers, not from professional men, but from small business men and those who work in shops and factories.

They had felt the dearth of money. The workers had been bereft of their purchasing power; the business men had been bereft of customers. This condition has persisted during the first 2 years of the Roosevelt administration. I say that the banks had lost their function; and that function is the accommodation of business with the money it needs for its transactions. Such accommodation is customarily supplied by this defunct or dying banking system by creating the accommodation with book figures, and accepting, as collateral, a larger sum in the form of securities pledged by the borrower. Up to the time of the depression in 1930 the banker has felt warranted in creating this new deposit money, subject to check, on the assumption that the collateral put up was "liquid"—that is, could be turned into money enough to satisfy the loan if the borrower failed to pay it.

Events have proved beyond any doubt whatever that this assumption is false. The new deposit money loaned, and backed one and one-tenth by the capital and surplus of the bankers, could not be liquidated by drawing on that capital and surplus, and it could not be liquidated by drawing on the collateral put up by borrowers.

Events have shown in the most conclusive manner that the billions of dollars of loans thus created by the banks with pen and ink were supported only by thin air. When they were called by wholesale, thus producing the depression, the values of the collateral put up vanished into thin air. The values of the properties and enterprises and skills making up the vast wealth of the United States, and amounting to 369 billions of dollars in 1929, disintegrated and disappeared until now they amount to only $200,000,000,000. The values of real estate, of the homes and buildings of the people and of business were, through the process of foreclosure, cut in half and then cut in half again. The whole credit structure based upon the theory of "liquidity" of collateral securities crumbled, until the banking institutions founded upon this theory failed to fulfill their prime function of supplying to American business the liquid funds needed to carry on its operations from day to day.

When the basic function of an institution becomes paralyzed, and when that institution underlies the whole fabric of a nation's wealth and business, the time for its replacement has come. The newspapers tomorrow will, in their headlines, declare that this is a meeting of inflationists. Their reports will state that our object is inflation of the Nation's money system, meaning an unjustified expansion of money and credit. The usual editorial comment upon conferences of this nature is that they are to aid and abet an administration which has already taken measures of inflation, and that our object is to intensify such measures.

What are the facts? There has been no inflation whatever during the first 2 years of the "new deal"; there has been no expansion of the medium of exchange. Instead, there has been a steady and uninterrupted contraction of the medium of exchange, a persistence of the influences of denial to American business which have brought about this depression.

Last week, on April 6, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation at Washington published figures which bear out this assertion.

The first consolidated statement of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation as of June 30, 1934, showed that the loans and discounts, including overdrafts of all insured commercial banks and trust companies of the United States, amounted to $15,000,000,000. The statement of April 6 shows that at the end of December 1934 the sums of loans and discounts, including overdrafts, had shrunk to $14,500,000,000, while the holdings of United States Government bonds in all commercial banks and trust companies had increased from $9,707,976,000 to $10,502,606,000.

This is the latest evidence of the continued contraction of the medium of exchange of the American people, which consists chiefly of bank deposits created out of loans and of the freezing of monetary assets of the banks in investments in interest-bearing, tax-exempt Government securities. It bears out the continued record of the Federal Reserve bank charts on bank credit and currency; this shows that the body of loans, demand and time, of all banks in the United States, which started on their toboggan slide in October 1929 from forty-two billions to twenty-two billions, have continued their descent after President Roosevelt came into office March 4, 1933, until the present day.

Talk with any banker. He will tell you that the calling in of loans has proceeded to the furthest extent that they could be liquidated; that the short-term loans on which the structure of circulating demand bank deposits is built have had to be constantly renewed, and have become involuntarily long-term loans, the collateral of which has fallen in value and cannot be realized upon to satisfy them. Otherwise they would be further liquidated and business would be further crippled.

This is true, notwithstanding the statement put out near the close of 1934 by the Association of Reserve City Bankers, through their president, Lyman E. Wakefield.

Mr. Wakefield declared that the banks of this association, which held about thirteen billions of deposits, had extended credit "lines" totaling over $6,000,000,000, of which only two billions was being used. Mr. Wakefield omitted to state that these lines of credit were extended to only a few great business corporations, such as General Motors, which did not need banking accommodations, and that had they been in dire need the lines of credit would not have been extended to them. That is, the commercial banking system of the United States can grant credits only to the most "liquid" businesses which have cash accounts in the banks in sums sufficient to meet all or more than all their needs.

This is the fatal defect in the banking system, by virtue of its being founded upon promises to pay on demand money which the banks have not got, on the theory that they can get it by converting collateral pledged into money. Because of such defect the Nye-Sweeney bill proposes that the commercial banking system be reorganized; that, instead of the required 10-percent reserve behind demand bank deposits, which has been proved to be totally inadequate, the banking system shall be supplied with 100-percent reserves. By this provision, the fear on the part of the bankers that they cannot pay 100 percent of their deposits upon demand, and therefore they will not lend, will vanish.

The bill authorizes the setting up of a bank of the United States of America, consolidating the 12 Federal Reserve banks as owned by the Government under a board of 48 directors elected from the 48 States, and authorized to take over the capital assets of the 12 banks now owned by the member banks, paying for them in legal-tender currency. It further authorizes the issuance of legal-tender currency in exchange for bonds of the United States Government equal to 100 percent of the deposits of all banks that are subject to check and payable on demand, and to 5 percent upon all time deposits, including savings and investment deposits.

This is not an inflationary measure. Every dollar issued for the purpose of creating a 100-percent reserve for the circulating medium of exchange will be retained in the vaults or on the books of the proposed bank of the United States, and not one dollar supporting such demand deposits will be circulated except upon a demand that will retire an equal amount of the deposits subject to check.

There is no inflation or expansion in this measure, in itself considered; but a justified expansion of demand bank deposits is authorized by the bill according to a mandate contained in the bill restoring to Congress its power to coin money and regulate the value thereof, according to the existing and growing capacity of the Nation to balance an added circulation of money with an added and continuous flow of goods and services upon a stable price level restored to the purchasing power of the dollar as of 1926.

It seems to me that a propitious opportunity presented itself to the present administration to exercise control over its monetary system at or about the time of the declaration of the bank holiday. This was a courageous act on the part of the administration, and for every remedial step in monetary reform accomplished to date those of us who are interested in seeing these corrections made are gratified.

The recent public announcement that the Treasury Department is about to retire the $675,000,000 of Panama Consuls; that the national banks are to be denied in the future the opportunity to issue their own currency, or what is commonly called by some counterfeit currency, and the added announcement that the Treasury Department contemplates the retirement of the first and second Liberty loan issues. This information is pleasant to those of us who have lived in expectation of modern monetary reform, and we commend the present administration for its efforts in this direction. We feel, however, that the evils that surround a monetary system controlled exclusively by private interests can only be removed by the restoring to Congress its constitutional power to issue money and regulate the value thereof. To this end the Nye-Sweeney bill provides for the creation of a Government-owned central bank, a bank which will be a bank of issue, which will be the sole fiscal agent of the Government of the United States, which will be the central depository of the reserves of all the commercial banks of the United States.

It proposes no new principle. The idea of a central bank in America is as old as Alexander Hamilton's first bank of the United States, established in 1791 with a charter that extended through 20 years and which was renewed in 1816 for a second period of 20 years. Though 80 percent of the stock of both of those banks were privately owned, the idea of a central bank lasted for 40 years of our history.

The fundamental principle embodied in this bill is the principle of democracy in banking. Economists, monetary experts, and laymen alike know to our sorrow what private banking—what banking under the control of private individuals—has done for this Nation. President Andrew Jackson, time and time again, gave expression to his fear of the results of the political control of banking.

I have called your attention to the establishment of the board of 48 directors elected from the various States. We have provided in this bill for the management by a board of 48 individuals, elected 1 from each State by the people thereof—a board modeled after the Senate of the United States, and which will have as active managers an executive committee of 7, and it is contemplated that this board will establish a branch bank of this central bank in every State of the Union. The object, frankly, is to break the concentrated power over money and banking which centers in the control of a little group of men in Wall Street.

Under the terms of this bill we propose to establish a uniform system of paper currency in place of the seven types of paper currency now in circulation in the United States; to wit, the Federal Reserve bank notes, Federal Reserve notes, gold certificates, silver certificates, national-bank notes, Treasury notes, 1890, and United States Treasury notes. Further, to provide for the purchase of all stock in the Federal Reserve banks and the nationalizing of this institution.

I have made a reference to the proposed requirement that demand deposits shall be secured by a 100-percent reserve. This will destroy a condition which the law permits today through the Federal Reserve System, whereby a bank can lend $1,000 in credit money for every $100 placed on deposit in currency. In 1929, when we boasted that we had fifty-eight billion of deposits in the banks of this Nation, we realized that that $58,000,000,000 was not money in the sense of currency, for there was never a full billion dollars in actual currency in the vaults of the banks of this Nation. The approximate $58,000,000,000 merely represented the right to withdraw fifty-eight billion, though the fifty-eight billion never existed.

Another principle approached in the bill is the requirement that our currency be so regulated through this proposed central bank that a dollar of our money, whether currency or credit, will represent from year to year and from generation to generation an equitable and stable buying power, freeing us from those periods of expansion and contraction, of inflation and deflation, such as the present, with their economic and financial destruction.

That there is a need of expansion of currency is amply demonstrated by the tremendous vote recorded by the House of Representatives in passing the Patman bill (H. R. 1), providing for the payment of adjusted-service certificates of veterans of the last World War.

This measure has been heralded far and wide as an inflationary measure. As you know, it provides for the payment of this obligation by the issuance of Treasury certificates in lieu of a bond issue. When this measure was proposed in the Seventy-second Congress, providing for the payment of these certificates by the issuance of Treasury notes, the opponents of this legislation called it a highly inflationary measure, and asserted it would throw us off the gold standard. We have been off the gold standard some time now, and the country has not gone to the eternal bow wows, as the false prophets intimidated in opposing any expansion of currency.

In his recent publication entitled "Inflation Ahead, What to Do About It", Mr. W. M. Kiplinger, eminent business writer and journalist, asked the questions, What is inflation? What is meant by inflation?

"Economists have various technical definitions, varying in many of the details. They all agree that inflation consists of the increase of the volume of money (currency or bank credit) beyond the normal needs of business at the particular time, plus active will of business to use the money. We already have the first condition—more money than business is using. We are approaching the second condition—the will to use it."

Mr. Kiplinger also asked the question, Can inflation be controlled?

"Yes; it can be controlled by various Federal Reserve measures and other powers involved in centralized control of credit, to be discussed in subsequent letters. But will it be controlled? Will the Government have the courage to put on the brakes at the future time when things seem all rosy? This must remain an open question. It can't be answered. There may be danger ahead in 1939 or 1940—a reaction from the inflation—another depression. Must always figure on this as a possibility."

The Patman bill referred to provides the necessary control, designating that power to the Secretary of the Treasury to contract the currency if in his judgment there appears to be undue inflation. I repeat that the vote—318 to 90—in the House of Representatives in passing the Patman bill on March 22, 1935, is indicative of the sentiment of the country and a mandate that if this obligation is to be met at this present session of Congress an expansion of the currency is necessary to pay this obligation. The House of Representatives has definitely committed itself against the payment of these certificates through the issue of tax-exempt, interest-bearing bonds.

We have strayed far afield from the control of our monetary system with the establishment of the Federal Reserve System in 1913. It remains for the people of the United States to take this problem in its hands and assist the constitutional power of Congress to issue money and regulate the value thereof.

In view of our experience of recent years, it appears to me as a layman that it is absolutely repugnant to continue the monetary system of the country in the hands of any private agency. The Bank of the United States of America, which is contemplated to be created by the Nye-Sweeney bill, places the absolute and final control of this institution in the hands of the United States Government.

SOCIAL-SECURITY BILL

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7260) to provide for the general welfare by establishing a system of Federal old-age benefits, and by enabling the several States to make more adequate provision for aged persons, dependent and crippled children, maternal and child welfare, public health, and the administration of their unemployment-compensation laws; to establish a Social Security Board; to raise revenue; and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. McREYNOLDS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to announce for the information of the gentleman from North Carolina and the gentleman from Massachusetts that the gentleman from North Carolina has consumed 3 hours and 35 minutes, and has 6 hours and 25 minutes remaining. The gentleman from Massachusetts has consumed 2 hours and 49 minutes and has 7 hours and 11 minutes remaining.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EATON].

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, judging from the overwhelming multitude of Members here this morning, it would seem that the House is deeply and profoundly interested in this legislation.

Mr. TREADWAY. Would the gentleman like to have a better audience? I think he deserves it. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

Mr. EATON. We have quality if we have not quantity.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. (After counting.) One hundred and one Members are present—a quorum.

Mr. TREADWAY. After the delay in counting a quorum, I think we should make sure that the Members stay with us. I think we should have a quorum all day on Saturday.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, all I can say is that I shall stay here if the rest will.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, we have not a quorum now, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. No business has transpired since the Chair counted a quorum.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The gentleman from New Jersey started to talk.

Mr. EATON. I made one illuminating remark, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count again. (After counting.) One hundred and three Members present—a quorum.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I question the count.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has ruled differently.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts that the Committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts) there were—ayes 17, noes 83.

So the Committee refused to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from New Jersey begins, I call attention to the fact that, notwithstanding the point of no quorum being raised by a Member of the minority, there is barely a baker's dozen present on that side, while we have a large number present on the Democratic side.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, before proceeding with my remarks, I wish to congratulate our distinguished Chairman on his mathematical gift. He is the chairman of my committee, and I have great affection and regard for him. I am glad that he has assisted in having one or two of these vacant pews filled.

In this proposed legislation, since there is only a scattering remnant of the House of Israel here this morning, I assume that those who have sufficient interest to follow me will pay attention to what I am going to say. I do not believe in the history of this Congress that a more difficult or more important piece of legislation has been presented to this House for its consideration. I am in favor, as I believe every man and woman in this organization is, of facing the problem of old-age pensions for the people of this country and making at least an intelligent effort to adequately solve it. I do not believe that any legislation, however well considered at this time, even though it professes to be permanent in form, will reach into the heights and depths of that great and pressing problem and finally solve it; but I am satisfied that we are making some attempt in this bill to face the situation and to begin a solution of the problem. Personally, I am deeply disappointed that the great Ways and Means Committee has not brought in by itself, separate and distinct from all other considerations, a single old-age-pension bill, open to discussion and amendment, supported by the public opinion of this Nation and susceptible of laying the foundation for a permanent solution of that great problem. As it is now, this bill contains what to my mind are some of the most dangerous and contentious provisions ever introduced before this House. These matters ought to come before us as separate bills and be discussed and voted upon each on its own merits.

I am in favor of an adequate old-age-pension proposal. By adequate I mean provisions that will insure to our worthy aged citizens a decent and honorable subsistence absolutely divorced from the taint of pauperism. I do not think the pension contained in this bill is adequate and I do not think it will satisfy the countless millions of our dear old folks who have been misled and disturbed by various people seeking personal advantage, some of them, and some of them absolutely sincere in their leadership; but it is a beginning, and if we will take the rest of the bill out, the obnoxious, unrelated, and burdensome features of annuities and unemployment insurance, and leave in those provisions made more adequate that have to do with ministering to human needs, both in childhood and old age, I am sure it will receive strong support from every portion of this House, and I would be glad to support it myself.

In this country at the present time we are suffering, as the rest of the world is, from a mental and moral collapse. There is nothing wrong with America except that the people have gone wrong morally. We had a great test in the 10 years of our prosperity, which we are accustomed on our side to attribute to the Republicans, and which you on the Democratic side are accustomed to attribute to luck; but we had a great and searching test of the moral stamina of our people in prosperity. While adversity has never yet been able to destroy us, with prosperity we plunged into a condition of extravagance, self-indulgence, materialism, and bye and bye wild speculation which carried us like the swine in the scriptures over the precipice, and now we are wallowing in the gloom of a great moral and intellectual collapse, and nobody can reasonably expect to see any permanent relief or solution of our problems until the people themselves, from center to circumference in this country, have acquired the practice and power once more of sound moral judgment and intellectual weighing of issues leading to a decision to do right when it is right because it is right, and not because some law has been placed on the statute books here in Washington, which substitute a policeman for personal conscience and the supervision of a bureaucrat for intelligent self-control, self-reliance, and self-direction on the part of the citizen.

Mr. Chairman, I read in the testimony before the Senate on the economic bill two amazing statements. One comes from the economic council, appointed by the President:

> The one almost all-embracing measure of security is an assured income. A program of economic security, as we vision it, must have as its primary aim the assurance of an adequate income to each human being in childhood, youth, middle age, or old age—in sickness or in health.

That sounds like the marriage ceremony—

> It must provide safeguards against all of the hazards leading to destitution and dependency.

Now, listen to this. One of the witnesses before the Senate committee made this statement:

> There is only one honest thing, as every member of this committee knows, for any administration to do, and I don't care whether it is Republican or Democratic, Communistic, or Socialist. The Federal Government, or the so-called "government" of every country, has to maintain its people.

Mr. Chairman, you place your finger there upon the central weakness of our thinking today. What is the Government, and where is it going to obtain resources to maintain its people? No dollar that any government spends has any other source except in the sweat and toil of brain and brawn of its wealth-producing people. There is no other possible source from which the Government can secure a supply of money to maintain its people. And as for the hazards of life, Mr. Chairman, how are you going to avoid hazards? They are the essence of life. There will not be a blade of grass grow to maturity this summer that does not have to fight for its existence every moment.

There will not be a bud on a tree that will come to fruition unless it has to fight for its life. Every man from the cradle to the grave faces hazards every day that no government, no legislation, no possible philanthropy can ever remove. First of all, there are the hazards of babyhood. Then babies grow to manhood and go to college and are denuded of their native intelligence. [Laughter.] Then, when you go down a little further in the scale of life and lose your job, you have the hazard of being taken over by Mr. Hopkins and induced to go "boondoggling", which I would consider the greatest hazard that has ever intruded into the life of a young man. Then you get married, and look at that for a hazard. By and by you are the victim of disease; of the inroads of age; of your own stupidities and poor judgment; of accident and climatic changes. This is a crazy notion, as expressed in a lot of this new-deal legislation, and accepted by increasing numbers of our people, that somehow, by some legerdemain, the Government of the United States can make it impossible and unnecessary for any of its citizens to face any difficulty, to run any risk, to bear any burden, but to be assured an income in youth, childhood, and old age, and even after they die. The thing is absolutely absurd.

I am opposed to this bill in all of its parts except those that have to do with that immediate ministering to human needs among young and old which is clearly the duty of society as a whole. I am especially opposed to it in the part that has to do with unemployment insurance in industry. I think I can speak with some authority on this subject, because I have spent the last 18 years of my life in the industries of this country, based upon the belief that industry has become the chief instrument of modern civilization, and unless industry in some way is permitted to function and solve its problems by its own initiative and in accordance with its own nature I do not see how civilization can escape final collapse. I admit with sorrow the failure of industrial leaders in the past to face the social implications of their job. They have been deluded, like everyone else, by the notion that a part is greater than the whole. But this ought not to involve capital punishment for all industry, nor does it justify turning all industry over to the control of politically minded bureaucrats.

I am shocked at the threat to industry contained in this bill. It amounts to a tax of 9 percent on the already overburdened industry of our country.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EATON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman does not understand there is any 9-percent tax for unemployment insurance, does he?

Mr. EATON. No; but you have got a tax for annuities on the employee and the employer, and you have unemployment insurance taxes which ought to be shared in by the employer as well as by the employee. This principle obtains in every country that has tried the plan and is embodied in the program proposed by various States of our country. Why do you not bring in a bill after a year's further study covering the problem of unemployment insurance? This question is so vital and far-reaching that it ought to be considered by itself.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I think if the gentleman will investigate, he will find that the study of unemployment insurance in this Congress began about a year ago. A subcommittee of the Ways and Means Committee held hearings. Then the matter was referred by the President to his Economic Security Committee, and they studied it for 6 months. Then the Ways and Means Committee have had it for about 3 months in this session. So that if you will add that all together you will find that the question has been studied for about a year.

Mr. EATON. I have been working on it in the industries for the last 18 years, and so far as I know only here and there has any industry been able to set up a solution that amounts to anything. Of course, all the political mind needs to do is to pick up a great complex structure like our national industrial and economic life, which took 300 years to create, pass a law, rub the Aladdin's lamp, and behold the millenium has come.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Did I understand the gentleman to say he had been in industry for 18 years?

Mr. EATON. That is correct.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I thought the gentleman had been representing a district in New Jersey for the past several years.

Mr. EATON. I have had that honor, I am proud to say, but is there any crime about being associated with the wealth-producing forces of this Nation? I own a farm and I raise cabbages. Is that wicked?

Mr. O'CONNOR. How about the corned beef?

Mr. EATON. I have suggested corned beef and cabbage. Our Irish friend rises at once to the bait.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. EATON. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. TREADWAY. I understood the gentleman had been watching the development of these various welfare factors over some period of years, and is rather somewhat of an expert.

Mr. EATON. Well, I do not claim to be an expert on anything any more.

Mr. TREADWAY. But has the gentleman seen this morning's paper, as to the result this bill will bring?

Mr. EATON. I regret that I have not.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I inform the gentleman?

Mr. EATON. I would be delighted to be illuminated.

Mr. TREADWAY. Here is an item appearing to be written as the result of a press interview with the President of the United States on yesterday, and the President is purported to have said that "unemployment insurance and old-age pensions go hand in hand, and together would ultimately answer the problem of balancing the Budget." Is that not a new discovery, that this enormous tax on industry will eventually balance the Budget? Would the gentleman kindly explain what line of argument the President of the United States must have had in mind to offer that suggestion as a method of balancing the Budget?

Mr. EATON. The only argument that he had in mind, in my judgment, is the firm conviction that in this country one is born every minute, and sometimes there are two. [Laughter.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Then, if I may still further interrupt the gentleman, on the second page of the same paper, from which I have just read, is a newspaper account of how, "with a twinkle in his eye, he took a stand shoulder to shoulder with his right-wing critics in spurning a pair of amendments proposed to the social-security bill in the House", which were to strike out those items, and then he goes on to say that the second one continues this balancing the Budget proposition. So that evidently we have a great deal of evidence from the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue that we now have a method of balancing the Budget by spending $2,800,000,000 more.

Mr. EATON. The most important item in that report, in my judgment, is the twinkle in his eye.

Mr. TREADWAY. I think so, too. [Laughter.]

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, I do not know what the prospect is for taking out of this bill the vital portions that have to do with old-age pensions and assistance to crippled children and leave these tremendous economic questions that have to do with our complex industry for future study, even though the Ways and Means Committee have spent fully 3 months on this, as I understood the gentleman to say.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EATON. I yield.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Our distinguished colleague from Massachusetts referred to the newspaper as authority for the President's statements. I wonder if the gentleman saw also Dun & Bradstreet's report that the greatest prosperity in the history of our country is now approaching under the present administration.

Mr. EATON. Will the distinguished and kindly gentleman from New York lift the veil and show us where it is?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. It is in the morning's paper; the gentleman is going by the newspaper report.

Mr. EATON. And the gentleman from New York is going by Dun & Bradstreet.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. What does the gentleman from New Jersey think about Dun & Bradstreet?

Mr. EATON. I have no brief for Dun & Bradstreet.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. But the gentleman is familiar with business. They get business pretty straight, do they not?

Mr. EATON. I used to be familiar with business when there was any. How far off is this prosperity? Is it just around the corner?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. What about the income taxes for 1934, 40 percent greater than for the previous year?

Mr. EATON. The reason for that is that this administration has enough snoopers and tweezers to force the taxpayers to cough up. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZPATRICK. To make them honest! [Applause.]

Mr. EATON. Yes; if that is your idea of honesty.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, the gentleman answered his own question. A few years ago the gentleman's party said that prosperity was just around the corner. When we took office on March 4, 1933, there was not even the corner left.

Mr. EATON. And now you propose to have a corner on prosperity.

I am thankful for all these helps as I go along. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I think we stand today in this country at the crossroads of a great decision which transcends all parties, all sections, and all interests; and this decision is whether we are going to choose American organized industry as the instrument for the solution of these tremendous, far-reaching problems, or whether we are going to resort to some modified form of Russianism and attempt to solve these problems by government. Now, you might as well face this issue; it is here. Before the new deal came in the gentleman from New York was different, my beloved friend O'CONNOR, whom I used to instruct when he was young, but who has wandered far from my instructions, I regret to say, although he still retains his pulchritude and affectionate nature. [Laughter.] He made some statement to the effect that political parties were responsible for depressions and for recovery. If we ever get out of this, no political party will do it, especially no Democratic Party, because we have none any more. You have not been within shooting distance of your platform since the first few months after the President came in. You have been acting as the representatives, the tool, of a non-American institution known as the new deal. And the ultimate aim of the new deal is to place all American industry, business, and individual liberties under the control of Government here in Washington. We have no Democratic Party and we have no Republican Party functioning as such in an American way. We are in a state of suspense awaiting to see what under heaven's name is going to happen to the country and to our Government.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, in view of the aid the gentleman has had from the other side of the House in his speech, I yield to him 15 additional minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. EATON. It seems incredible to me that 20 minutes have gone. I have hardly got within speaking distance of what I want to say. [Laughter.] Mr. Sam Jones used to say that some people stuck to their text when they preached, but that he stuck to his crowd. I would be glad to do that, if I had a crowd to stick to this morning.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EATON. With pleasure to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Inasmuch as the gentleman has 15 minutes, I hope he will use this time not to criticize the new deal but to tell us what he and the Republican Party would do if they were in power today. [Applause.]

Mr. EATON. Now, just think of that! [Laughter.]

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EATON. Certainly; I feel highly honored.

Mr. TRUAX. I thank the gentleman. A while ago the gentleman from New Jersey quoted the distinguished Sam Jones. I wonder if the gentleman recalls a statement or phrase that the Reverend Jones used namely:

It is always the hit dog that yelps loudest.

I presume, from the fact the industrialists are yelping loudest, that they are the ones hit by certain features of this bill.

Mr. EATON. Does the gentleman wish to draw a comparison between the yelps of politicians and industrialists?

Mr. TRUAX. No; I am talking about industrialists. I understood that the gentleman was an industrialist.

Mr. EATON. Well, the gentleman's understanding, as usual, is about 90 percent off. [Laughter.]

Mr. TRUAX. The gentleman admitted it; the gentleman just said that he was associated with industry for 18 years.

Mr. EATON. But I have not represented the wicked capitalist. I have represented the down-trodden and the oppressed workingman in whom the gentleman is interested.

Mr. TRUAX. I am glad to hear the gentleman say that, and I hope he will confirm that statement now.

Mr. EATON. What statement?

Mr. TRUAX. That the gentleman represents the down-trodden workingman.

Would the gentleman favor a resolution to the effect that all Members of Congress should devote their full time to their work as Members of Congress, for which they are well paid, in my humble judgment?

Mr. EATON. Except for the quorum calls. [Laughter.] Now is the gentleman exhausted?

Mr. TRUAX. For the present, temporarily; but I hope to come back.

Mr. EATON. Does the gentleman feel that he may recover within 15 minutes?

Mr. TRUAX. Possibly so.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, after being led astray by these tempters, I now come back to the real issue in this bill. It is just one more block in the way of recovery, one more power to create uncertainty and anxiety in the minds of American business. I recognize the faults of industrialists. The gentleman from Ohio, my dear old State, which has gone crazy by going Democratic in recent months, speaks of the industrialists as if they are very wicked. They are like politicians. They have a streak of fat and a streak of lean, but if you take the industrialists out and stand them before the wall and destroy them, what is going to happen to the politicians? What is going to happen to the Nation?

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EATON. Just for one chapter.

Mr. TRUAX. I may say to the gentleman from New Jersey that I am not a politician. I formerly was a hog raiser.

Mr. EATON. I can believe that. [Laughter.]

Mr. TRUAX. Until the hog prices were wrecked by the gentleman's administration. Will the gentleman yield further? I am sure he will get some more time and I would like to finish my statement. After the Republican Party did just what the gentleman said we are doing to the industrialists, namely, put all the farmers out of business for 12 years, I still think all the more of the four-legged hogs on my farm.

Mr. EATON. I am glad to see brethren dwell together in unity. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, this frivolity is very disconcerting. I apologize if the gentleman takes that bad.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EATON. Can I get more time?

Mr. TREADWAY. How soon will the gentleman begin his main speech?

Mr. EATON. That will depend on the number of interruptions on this side.

Mr. TREADWAY. I am sure my colleague wants to be courteous to both sides of the House, but I think he has been very generous in yielding so far.

Mr. EATON. I have enjoyed it.

Mr. TREADWAY. If he wants more time for his own speech, I will be glad to yield the time to him when he has finished with the gentleman from California.

Mr. EATON. That would be rather indefinite.

Mr. HOEPPEL. I would like to have the Members of the House informed as to what the gentleman would do, and what the Republican Members of Congress would do, to get the country out of the depression if they were in charge of the administration of its affairs, as are we Democrats. I would also like to ask the gentleman if he is in favor of Mr. Hoover's ideas on the gold standard?

Mr. EATON. That is too large a dose for one swallow. Mr. Hoover's ideas on the gold standard I leave to experts like the gentleman from California. But what would we do if we did what the country needs to have done for it? This new-deal administration is piling up debts which, with all this legislation that is now going through removing hazards from human life and the like, will involve an absolute and necessary tax every year on the industrial and productive wealth of this Nation of between seven and ten billion dollars and there is no escape.

Mr. Chairman, the first thing we would do, or will do, when we come in power next year, is to take an ax and chop out the upas tree of bureaucracy which has been overlaid on the industry of this Nation by the new deal to an extent never equaled in its history.

Mr. McFARLANE. Did the Republican Party ever do that when they were in power? If so, name the date.

Mrs. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. EATON. The gentleman has an answer to the question by the gentlewoman from California.

Mr. McFARLANE. I would like an answer from the gentleman. He has the floor.

Mr. EATON. The gentleman is very kind to make that suggestion.

Mr. Chairman, if and when the Republicans are in power, we would undertake to balance the Budget. We have heard of that phrase before. We would not do it by means of double-barreled bookkeeping, in which one set of books is fixed up so that it matches the income, and the other set of books is built up like the fellow that shingled his roof on the fog—nobody knows what it means. Then we would cease wrapping American industry in the graveclothes of brainless and inexperienced bureaucracy which could not run a shoe factory or industry to save its soul. Then we would try to cut down the normal expenses of government. A few deserving Democrats that will be covered in under the civil service before you get through, in order to prevent contingencies, we would try to get rid of them; and then we would try to run the Federal Government alone and let the States run their own governments and let the people run their own business, giving a chance once more for American industry, American initiative, and American self-reliance to assert themselves. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I had a fine speech here, but I have chased so many rabbit tracks that I have kind of lost interest in it. I am like the new deal—I do not know where I am going to come out.

Mr. TREADWAY. Would the gentleman care for additional time to make his own speech?

Mr. EATON. On some other occasion.

Mr. TREADWAY. I will be glad to yield the gentleman a few additional minutes in order to make his speech.

Mr. EATON. I rather rejoice in the opportunity of addressing such an intelligent assembly, but I yield back the balance of my time, except to say that this legislation does not provide adequate care for the aged, but it does lay a new and intolerable burden of taxation and control upon American industry without solving the problem of unemployment. It is simply one more step toward sovietizing our distinctive American institutions, devitalizing the self-reliance and enterprise of our people, and mortgaging our future by a debt so mountainous that we will be in grave danger of repudiation or inflation. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. BURNHAM].

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. Chairman, we have all been tremendously interested in the wit, wisdom, and repartee indulged in by our distinguished colleague from New Jersey, Dr. EATON, as well as the participation of other Members of the House. We have also been edified, I am sure, by the illuminating and eloquent address of our friend from New Jersey. My remarks will be brief.

It is not very often that I take the floor, or ask for time to present my views, but the subject under discussion is one that I am tremendously interested in, although I confess I cannot work up much enthusiasm over the pending social-security bill, for I do not believe that it will do all that this great Government should do for its aged people. I say great Government, because it is a great Government notwithstanding the fact that we are still in the depths of the greatest depression this country has every known. All around us, wherever we go, there is suffering and destitution, showing only too well how very necessary it is to enact some legislation that will fortify our national home life and humanity against want and distress during enforced unemployment and old age.

To my mind we will never bring about recovery until we restore confidence and solve the unemployment problem. This alone and this only can bring prosperity to our Nation and happiness to our people. It is just common American "horse sense", and I still have faith in the common sense of the American people.

As I said before, I do not believe that this pending legislation will bring about the desired results and for that reason I would like to see the bill, introduced by my distinguished colleague from California [Mr. MCGROARTY], emboding what is known as the "Townsend old-age revolving pension plan", brought up on the floor of this House for full and open discussion. I was present throughout most of the hearings on the original bill introduced by Mr. MCGROARTY, and was pleased to appear before the committee on February 6, urging serious and sympathetic consideration of its various phases and far-reaching possibilities.

I was interested in the statement of Dr. Robert R. Doane, an eminent economist of New York City, who appeared before the committee at the request of Dr. Townsend. The facts, figures, and statistics submitted by him and which appear in the hearings confirm my belief that the provisions of the McGroary bill would bring about not only relief and security for the aged, but that they also point the way to national economic recovery.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNHAM. I yield.

Mr. BUCK. When the gentleman appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means, with respect to the original McGroarty bill, did he not state, as recorded on page 968 of the hearings, "Introduced by Mr. MCGROARTY, as it is drawn, I do not think that it is practical"?

Mr. BURNHAM. I stand by my statements as you will find them in the RECORD. That bill, as I said at that time, and as I still believe, was somewhat loosely drawn, but I think the new bill or the substitute or amended bill is very much better and is economically sound.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. BURNHAM. I yield.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Would the gentleman be kind enough to explain the bill? I would like to get some information about it.

Mr. BURNHAM. I am not here at this time to explain that bill. I may state to my friend that if the bill comes before the House I shall be pleased, if I am granted time, to give a full explanation of it.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. There is a possibility that we may get a vote on it, and I should like to get the gentleman's explanation of it.

Mr. BURNHAM. I should vote for it.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. But the gentleman could not explain it?

Mr. BURNHAM. I would be glad to explain it, although I might not explain it to the gentleman's satisfaction.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I would simply like to get your explanation of it.

Mr. BURNHAM. If the gentleman will allow me to proceed, I will be glad to state what is in my mind.

Having been an ardent advocate of a liberal old-age pension for many years, I very naturally became interested in the plan evolved by Dr. Townsend, whom I know to be a thoughtful, intelligent, earnest, honest, and sincere man. Nearly a year ago I filed with the Speaker of the House numerous petitions, bearing the names of thousands of my constituents, who are vitally interested in the plan and demand its consideration. I have discussed its possibilities with many Members of the House and the Senate, individually and collectively. Some think it fantastic and visionary, chiefly because they have not taken time to consider it, while others like myself believe that it possesses merit and that there is much to recommend it. Certainly it is worthy of serious consideration. It cannot be laughed off. It cannot be brushed aside.

Less than 40 years ago the Wright brothers were laughed at when they attempted to fly the first machine, yet as a result of their tireless efforts we are today spanning continents and oceans with fast flying planes, helping to make the world a better place in which to live, and if we would help to make the world a better place in which to live, let us start by providing those elderly people, who have passed the heyday of life, and whose shadows are lengthening, with not only the necessities of life but also with the comforts to which they are entitled.

The recipients of old-age pensions should not be made to feel that they are objects of charity by being compelled to take the pauper's oath, for, after all, they are merely receiving what is justly due them, having contributed to the support of the Government during their years of gainful occupation. We find many hard-working, thrifty, frugal people who invested their savings in supposedly gilt-edged securities, hoping and believing that the income from their investments would adequately provide for them during their declining years but, through force of circumstances over which they had no control, find their investments wiped out and their savings gone. Fear and apprehension of such a condition is the cause of much unhappiness and distress in this country. Fear of facing a penniless old age is the cause of much insanity.

One of the interesting features of the Townsend plan is to retire from gainful occupation those persons above the age of 60 years. By so doing enough vacancies would be created to absorb many of the idle and unemployed persons now on the relief rolls. It would also help to make room for the hundreds of thousands of young men and women who are graduating from high schools and colleges without prospects of employment of any kind. Again I say the unemployment problem, due in some measure to the increasing mechanization of our industrial system, is the greatest obstacle to economic recovery. If a way can be found to adequately care for the elderly people and at the same time put the idle to work, it would make for a contented and happy Nation. It would tend to lessen crime and greatly reduce communistic activities, thereby effecting a great monetary saving. The cost of crime runs into billions. The vast amount of money spent in crime prevention, crime detection, crime prosecution, jails, penitentiaries, and insane asylums would go a long way toward paying a liberal old-age pension. Savings in other taxes through the abolishment of the need for poor farms, relief agencies, and institutions for the care of the indigent will partly offset the transaction tax provided for in the Townsend plan. There will be no longer any necessity for the enormous pension payments by Government agencies and private industries. Security for old age will be assured and poverty will be reduced to a minimum.

The revolving fund provided for in the Townsend plan would certainly tend to increase the purchasing power of the Nation, which in turn would increase consumption; and if we increase consumption, we must of necessity increase production, and this, of course, means that the wheels of industry would be started, the idle put to work, and prosperity restored.

This proposed plan of old-age security is attracting Nation-wide attention, and many millions of worthy citizens throughout the United States are vitally interested in it; they are entitled to be heard. They have sent us here to represent them. I do not know how long I shall remain here, nor am I concerned, but while I am here I shall do my full duty by those who constitute my constituency. [Applause.] Here is one of many resolutions of a similar character which I have received. I offer it for your consideration. I will not take time to read it but ask unanimous consent to have it included in my remarks. It is from the Board of County Supervisors of San Diego County, Calif.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

Before the Board of Supervisors of San Diego County, State of California, on the 25th day of February 1935

In the matter of resolution urging United States Congress to enact into law H. R. 3977, bill known as the "Townsend old-age revolving pension act"

Whereas the economic situation in the county of San Diego, State of California, and Nation, is such that an unusual remedy is required to restore and maintain prosperity, to provide jobs for the unemployed, to create positions for those graduating from our schools and colleges, to care for the million of aged men and women, many of whom no longer have visible means of support, with no opportunity of procuring labor, to feed and care for the more than 7,000,000 of undernourished children, to take from the highways the young boys and girls now without homes; and

Whereas it appears that social security can only be secured and the wheels of industry set in motion and made to continually revolve by the creation of a tremendous buying power; and

Whereas the present system of dole, designated as welfare and emergency relief, is detrimental to the morale of our citizenry and is not restoring normal conditions, and never will if continued; and

Whereas Congress now has before it a substantial remedy and curative which will meet our economic ill and produce a normal healthy condition for all time to come, which will restore prosperity to our Nation, happiness to millions, and social well-being for all: Therefore be it

Resolved by the supervisors of the county of San Diego, State of California, That we do respectfully urge the Congress of the United States, now assembled, to enact into law H. R. 3977, "A bill to promote the general welfare, to assure permanent employment and social security for all, and to stabilize business conditions through an assured definite and constant circulation of money and credit by the National Government, and for other purposes"; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to both the Senate and House of Representatives, to the President of the United States, officially signed and attested by the seal of the county of San Diego, State of California.

Passed and adopted by the Board of Supervisors of the county of San Diego, State of California, on the 25th day of February 1935, by the following vote, to wit:

Ayes: Supervisors Hastings, Richards, Trussell, Hicks, and Sweet.

Noes: Supervisors, none.

Absent: Supervisors, none.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA,

County of San Diego, ss:

I, J. B. McLees, do hereby certify that I am the county clerk of the county of San Diego, State of California, and ex-officio clerk of the board of supervisors of said county; that the foregoing resolution was passed and adopted by the board of supervisors at a regular meeting thereof at the time and by the vote above stated.

[SEAL] J. B. MCLEES,

County Clerk and ex-officio Clerk of the Board of Supervisors.

By C. BUCKLEY, Deputy.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MOTT].

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, I am very much pleased that the opportunity has come at last to discuss the question of old-age pensions before a body that has not only the inclination but the authority to do something about it. For the first time in the history of our country the Congress of the United States is now actually engaged in considering an old-age-pension bill and in the course of the next few weeks a Federal old-age-pension law will have been placed upon the statute books of the Nation.

I am not at all satisfied with the old-age-pension provisions of the bill which is now before us under the rule adopted for its consideration on Thursday of this week, and, so far as I know, nobody is satisfied with them. I repeat now what I stated on Thursday, that no one believes that the old-age pension provided in the bill is adequate.

No one whom I know of is seriously of the opinion that the old-age-pension proposal in the pending bill will do what people of the United States generally want and hope and expect a Federal old-age-pension law to do, and from now until the final vote is taken on this bill I intend to do everything within my power to have the bill amended in such a way that it will at least partially meet the demand of the people of this country for an adequate Federal old-age-pension law. The demand for an adequate old-age-pension law has been perhaps the greatest, the most sincere, and the most human demand that has ever been made in this country by the people for any kind of Federal legislation, and it is our duty to try to meet that demand honestly and courageously and to the best of our ability, having in mind always the greatest good to the whole of our common country.

I would be disappointed, indeed, if I did not think this House were willing to go a great deal further toward satisfying this demand than what is proposed in this bill, and I desire to express now not merely the hope but the conviction that with the bill now before us as a nucleus, inadequate as it is, the House and the Senate will be able to amend it into a good bill, and that when we make a good bill out of it the President will sign it.

I am particularly happy to learn, according to the quoted statements of the Democratic leaders reported in the papers yesterday, that they probably will not object to the offer, by way of amendment, of other plans of old-age pensions as substitutes for the pension plan recommended in the President's bill. I sincerely trust the report of their recent decision is true and that they will not change their minds before the debate is concluded. I think this is a very liberal view for the leaders to take, because, as I stated in the debate upon the rule, I think there is no question that the offer of substitution of any other pension bill providing for a special method of taxation is not germane to this bill. And so I want to congratulate the majority leaders and to say to them that if they will keep their reported promises and not object to these offers, in spite of the fact they are not germane, then they have done all that we have asked. And let me say, also, that if they will do that, then it means that those of us who fought the rule on Thursday, although we suffered a technical defeat, have really won a moral victory.

I want to confine my remarks to this bill, and I do not want to discuss at this particular time any of the other plans which are now before the Congress.

When these other plans are offered next week and the point of order is not made against them, I intend to discuss them all, and in as much detail as possible I desire particularly to discuss the revised McGroarty bill at that time.

Just in passing, however, I want to say one thing now about the revised McGroarty bill. This is only a preliminary suggestion and is by way of admonition. If this bill is offered by way of amendment, I hope that the Members who discuss it, and particularly those who intend to oppose it, will discuss that bill upon the basis of what it actually is, and not upon rumor or hearsay, and not upon the basis of what the bill is not. I hope that gentlemen who refer to it will not refer to it as the $200-a-month pension bill, or as a $24,000,000,000 bill, as was done during the course of the debate upon the rule. Such statements are clearly ridiculous and show an amazing ignorance of the bill on the part of any gentleman who makes them.

Mr. BUCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOTT. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BUCK. I wish the gentleman would explain just what the new McGroarty bill is and what it does.

Mr. MOTT. I stated that I could not go into a discussion of any of these other bills in my remarks on the pending bill today, but I will take just a minute to tell my distinguished friend what the revised McGroarty bill is not. In the first place, it is not a $200-a-month pension bill. It provides for the imposition of a 2-percent transaction tax, which, according to Dr. Doane's testimony before the Ways and Means Committee, will raise about $4,000,000,000 per year, and that $4,000,000,000 will pay to the eligibles under the bill about $50 a month. That is what the revised McGroarty bill provides for at the present time. The other small taxes also provided in the bill will probably increase that amount slightly. All mention of the $200 should be out of the debate, when the debate comes, because the bill does not provide for it. If it is to be discussed, I hope gentlemen will discuss it on the basis of what it is. That is all the time I can devote to this point now.

Mr. YOUNG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOTT. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. YOUNG. I agree with the gentleman, and he is making a fine speech. The present McGroarty bill is entirely different from the old. But when the gentleman says that so much revenue will be produced and so much annuity, is it not a fact that the entire cost of administration must be paid under the provisions of the bill before any annuity will be paid?

Mr. MOTT. That is correct.

Mr. BUCK. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. MOTT. I will yield, but I think I ought to suggest that if I yield any more I may not have any time to discuss the pending bill at all. I did want to say something about the bill under discussion during a part of the time allotted to me.

Mr. BUCK. Is it not a fact that the new McGroarty bill has not been made known to the rank and file of the supporters, so that we are getting requests for the passage of the original bill?

Mr. MOTT. That is undoubtedly true, and I think it is very unfortunate. I think the people of the country should be informed as to just exactly what the revised bill is. I hope every Member will read it and study it, and be prepared to discuss it accurately and thoroughly when it comes up. I would like to have full, free, open, and intelligent debate upon it, and I hope gentlemen will be prepared to discuss it when it is presented. I may say that there are other amendments, many of them of a necessary and vital character, that will also be offered to the revised bill.

Mrs. GREENWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOTT. I yield to the lady from Arizona.

Mrs. GREENWAY. Many of my constituents have already had that bill read, and it has been read at meetings, and still think it carries $200.

Mr. MOTT. I am sorry to say that there still seem to be many people in the country who think that it carries $200, but, of course, that is impossible. Four billion dollars a year will not provide $200 a month to the eligibles under the bill according to any testimony before the committee.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOTT. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MICHENER. I think as a matter of fact the promoters of the Townsend plan, if this change has been made, should so state. There have been in my district a number of speakers and organizers—Dr. Munger, from California, and others—within the last 2 weeks, and the impression they leave, as stated in the daily press, is that there has been no material change in the bill, and these old people are still expecting $200. I agree with the gentleman from Oregon. I have read the bill. It will not pay $200 a month; and the leaders of the plan, if they are in the gallery, I hope will take this to heart and follow the suggestion and state to the folks at home just what the new bill does.

Mr. MOTT. If that is true, I am extremely sorry to hear it. For anybody to suggest or hold out that the new McGroarty bill is going to pay $200 a month, or any sum nearly like that, is entirely wrong, and it certainly should not be done.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOTT. Yes; I yield to the able gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is one of the leaders of his party here in the House, and one of its spokesmen. I wonder if he could tell us whether the Republican Party in the House is backing the new McGroarty bill?

Mr. MOTT. I would not say that at all. I have never considered this old-age-pension matter a partisan subject, and I do not think anyone on the Republican side so considers it.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to make a friendly suggestion?

Mr. MOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I know from study of the new McGroarty bill that the gentleman has made a very clear and concise statement of its contents, and the important change which has been made in the McGroarty bill, but, further, I have seen Associated Press statements published in the papers in my district in which it is stated specifically that this change was made for the purpose of preventing overpayment. I think it is not fair to have such an explanation of that change made to the people of the country.

The change does just what the gentleman from Oregon says its does, that if, under Dr. Doane's own figures, through the medium of a transaction tax and other taxes we could raise $4,000,000,000 in taxes it would pay a pension of about $50 each, a very reasonable pension, and yet the supporters of the plan throughout the country are being told that the change is being made to prevent overpayment.

Mr. MOTT. I have already said that in my opinion such a statement cannot possibly be justified. Now, Mr. Chairman, I undertook to do no more at this time than to state very briefly what this revised McGroarty bill was not, and I did not even intend to enter this far into a discussion of it. It was solely on account of some of the unusually wild and unsupportable statements that have been made here on the floor of the House in connection with it I thought it proper at this time to state what I have stated. I trust gentlemen will now permit me to proceed without further interruption during the brief remainder of my time.

Mr. Chairman, I know there are gentlemen here who know a great deal more about old-age-pension legislation than I do, but I dare say that there is no one here who has given it more careful and thoughtful study over a longer period of time, or who perhaps has had more actual experience in the consideration and enactment of old-age-pension legislation than my humble self. I have been very actively and continuously interested in the subject ever since I entered public life. I have tried during all of that time to overlook no opportunity, to spare no effort, to have this great humanitarian principle translated into statutory law, and it is one of the happiest moments of my life to know now that we are going to accomplish that at this session of the Congress; that we are at least going to make an actual beginning by putting an old-age-pension law upon the Federal statute books. I shall be proud always to have been a Member of the Congress which first did that. I want, with all the rest of you, to make this as good a law as we can possibly make it, and that is why I am glad that it has developed, since the rule was adopted Thursday, that the procedure here is going to be open, and that we are going to be able to give consideration to every worthy plan that may be advanced.

I was coauthor of the first old-age-pension bill introduced into the legislature of my State. That was some 10 years ago. The bill did not pass at that session because there was as yet no demand even for a State old-age pension. Yet at that time I stated—and, so far as I know, I was one of the first men to make the statement—that within 10 years not only would every State have an old-age-pension law but that ultimately the matter of old-age-pension legislation would become a subject of exclusive Federal jurisdiction, and I think that prediction has a good chance of being fulfilled at this session of the Congress. I think most people of the country agree now that it ought to be a matter of Federal jurisdiction. Old age is universal throughout the country and unemployment is universal, and both have become national rather than State problems.

My idea of an adequate Federal old-age pension is different, perhaps, than the idea entertained by some. The original idea of the old-age pension, as you know, was that it was a substitute for the poorhouse, and I may say that at the time when that theory was first advanced it probably was a good theory.

Now, however, a new and entirely different theory and reason obtains, and it has been brought about naturally and logically by reason of an industrial evolution that has been taking place in this country and the world during the last generation. So that most people agree at the present time that a system of old-age pensions is absolutely necessary, if our economic and industrial system in this country is to survive. The problem has become an economic as well as a humanitarian one.

The reason for that is very simple. Within the last 30 or 40 years, but particularly within the last 10 years, our methods of producing and distributing and selling the things that we want and that we need have become so perfect through the improvement of ourselves and our machinery that it requires now only a portion of our population to produce, distribute, and sell everything that we need and everything we can afford to buy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes more to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. MOTT. We have normally an unemployment problem of some eight or ten million. We have more unemployed people than that now, of course, but even if we should return to normal conditions, in the opinion of a great many authorities on the subject, we would still have an unemployment problem of at least eight million, and it will be a permanent problem. Those 8,000,000 people must be taken care of. They are permanently out of jobs, not because they want to be, not through any fault of their own, but because modern industry under our present system cannot absorb them. They are surplus, and this problem must be faced and solved. There are several ways in which to do it, but as I see it, the whole problem resolves itself down to but two real alternatives, and we must choose either the one or the other of them.

The alternatives that logically present themselves to me are these: We can continue to operate industry under the present system, a necessary byproduct of which must be permanent unemployment for millions of men, and we can continue to keep these unemployed men on direct or indirect relief; or, as the other alternative, we can, by appropriate legislation, spread employment in private industry by dividing the work necessary to be done among all those who are able to do it, and by subsidizing those who are not.

Those who are able to do the work required by modern industry are those who are physically able and who have not reached the age limit of their economic usefulness in and to industry. If the available work required by modern industry to supply all of our needs and desires were confined to and distributed among this restricted portion of our population, I believe it would be economically feasible and entirely possible to subsidize the rest of it. By the rest I mean those people on either end of the life chain, the very young and the very old.

The very young are already subsidized to a large extent by the Government, by the way of free schooling and otherwise, and this policy of subsidization by Government of those who have not yet entered upon the period of their real economic usefulness has of late years been increasing, both as to the amount of the subsidy and as to the duration of it.

Now, there are between eight and ten million people in this country above the age of 60 years, and this number represents, as nearly as we can calculate it, approximately the number of what I have referred to as the permanently unemployed—the number, in other words, which must continue to remain unemployed under our present economic and industrial system. And in this connection I call your attention to the fact that in this country during the past 10 or 15 years the average increase of normal unemployment has been at about the same ratio as the increase in the number of people over 60 years of age.

I state it now as a bald fact which I think is recognized by everyone, that these millions of people over 60 years of age, for the most part, reached the end of their real economic usefulness in and to modern industry and that industry cannot take care of them without displacing an equal number of those who are still within the age of the effectiveness required by modern industry. If, therefore, that portion of our population which has passed this age limit could be retired under conditions which would enable them to cease competition altogether with the younger and more efficient workers a large part of our unemployment problem obviously would be solved.

The particular method or plan by which this subsidation is to be brought about is not, in my opinion, very material, so long as the plan is financially sound and is able to actually raise the revenue required to pay the retirement pensions. The tax necessarily must be large, but there is no way to avoid that if we are to attempt in any adequate way to solve this problem. The tax will have to be paid by that portion of our people which does the work and earns the income. That means the burden will have to be borne by all those who are living in their income-producing age. The beneficiary of this subsidy would, of course, bear his full share of the burden also, because he would be subject to taxation during the whole portion of his income-producing life and until he reaches the age of retirement.

It is not my intention here to say anything whatever about the humanitarian angle of this problem. My observation has been that its desirability from that angle has long since been so thoroughly conceded that it is no longer a subject of argument or controversy.

The question remains now, What is an adequate old-age pension? That is to say, what amount of pension is necessary for the beneficiaries to receive in order to bring about the economic remedy I am here urging?

I think it follows logically from what I have said that the only adequate kind of an old-age-pension law is a law providing for a pension large enough to support the pensioner in decency and comfort after he has passed the age of economic usefulness and to retire him completely from the field of competition with younger men. It would be difficult to justify, either from the economic or the humanitarian angle, a pension larger than is necessary to do this; but, on the other hand, a pension which is not large enough to do it is totally inadequate and cannot be justified on any ground whatever as a solution to the problem of old age and unemployment. And let me say in this connection that as a condition precedent to eligibility for the kind of an adequate pension I have suggested is that the pensioner be required actually to retire from competition and to spend his pension money. Without such a condition one of the basic reasons for an adequate old-age pension is defeated.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOTT. I yield briefly to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman stated there were normally 10,000,000 unemployed. I wish to suggest to my friend that there are normally from two and a half to three and a half million.

Mr. MOTT. Well, that is a difference of opinion. It is my opinion that there are 10,000,000 unemployed in this country at the present time who will remain unemployed, even if good times return, on account of the natural evolution in industry, and in this I am sustained, I think, by the best research and authority we have on this question.

There are more than 20,000,000 people on relief today, according to the actual figures of the Federal Relief Administrator. How many of that 20,000,000 are employed? Few, indeed, or they would not be on relief; and after the relief is finished, after the $4,800,000,000 of the present works relief is exhausted, how many of those 20,000,000 will be absorbed in private industry? I say to the gentleman we will be fortunate, indeed, if half of them can go back. We will be fortunate, indeed, if no more than 10,000,000 are still unemployed.

I think at the present time the real thing at issue before this House in the consideration of the pending old-age-pension bill is, What is an adequate old-age pension? I ask gentlemen to keep their minds upon that question when they read the old-age provisions of the President's bill.

I ask them to try to reconcile in their own minds the proposed maximum Federal contribution of $15 per month with any individual idea they may have as to what constitutes an adequate old-age pension. I ask them to try to reconcile that $15 with any hope, with any plea, or with any just demand on the part of the aged and the needy of their own States for an adequate old-age pension. Let me say to gentlemen who so glibly praise the President's bill that they are confronted with a problem and a question here which the President's bill does not answer to the satisfaction of anyone.
